While the Bison offense was sputtering, the Leopard defense was putting on one of its better performances of the season.

"Our defense has been the heart and soul of this team," Lafayette Head Coach Frank Tavani said.

The Leopard defense was enough to stall the Bison.

"We had some momentum going at different times, but when you have plays that lose yardage it makes it tough," Kotulski said.

The Bison are looking to play the spoiler in the Patriot League over the next two weeks.

"Wins would help us in the off-season. I don't want this losing attitude to carry over to the off-season," Wilson said.

"I look at the kids and still see them fighting. The biggest thing is that we have to fight. You can never accept losing," Kotulski said.

added 10 digs to help lead the Orange and Blue to victory.

The Bison started the match with Carolyn Dougherty '05 in the important libero position, and Anderson finished the match. Dougherty captured six digs and Anderson captured 11 to help the Bison defensive effort.

After the victory on Friday night the women returned on Saturday, only to be defeated by the Black Knights of Army in three games. The games came down to the final few points, but unfortunately the Bison were unable to come out with the win.

The Black Knights captured a close 30-27 victory in the first game, and grabbed a decisive 30-17 victory in the second.

After the intermission the Bison fought back, with the lead going back and forth throughout the course of the match, but unfortunately fell short, losing 33-31.

"Our team was disappointed with the loss," Anderson said. "We didn't play as a team, we played as individuals and we definitely learned the hard way. "You have to play volleyball as a unit one and if you don't, you will suffer the consequences like we did against Army."

Ghiz recorded 19 kills for the Bison, while Breean Trapasso and Anderson each added 14 digs to the Bison effort. Breean Trapasso also added 29 assists, but the Black Knight offense proved to be too much for the Orange and Blue.

Bucknell completed the Homecoming Weekend with a 14-12 overall record and 8-5 Patriot League record.

The Bison will finish their regular season play on Saturday, Nov. 16 in Davis Gymnasium, when they host Patriot League opponent Colgate at 7 p.m. This game determines the Bison's playoff future so come down and support Bucknell Volleyball.

"Making it to the Patriot League Tournament was the primary goal we set for ourselves starting on Aug. 14. Being able to go back this year was an amazing accomplishment and a huge credit to the amount of work put in this season." Amy Marvel '03 said. "We had to play Lafayette, the No. 1 seed and the tournament host. We knew how good they were and had a specific game plan to slow them down. They are an outstanding team and deserve all of the success that they have accumulated this season. It was an extremely tough game, but I was proud of Bucknell's fight the entire 70 minutes and the class we showed not only in this game but throughout the season."

Goalkeeper Sonja Wettergreen '03 recorded six saves for the game, while Lafayette had four stops. Bucknell had seven shots on goal, and the Leopards had 21.

On Nov. 6, four Bucknell teammates were named to the All-Patriot League field hockey team. Forward Meiko Boynton '05 and defender Kate Ruda '04 made the Patriot League first team. Also to be commended was midfielder Marvel and defender Lindsey Gentel '04, who received second team citations.

"All I can really say is that it is a great honor to be named first team All-Patriot League and that it is nice to be recognized even though I am a defensive player and I am obviously not the one scoring the goals," Ruda said.

"I was very happy to have four players named All-Patriot League and all four were first-time honorees. It's a wonderful reward for Amy Marvel to end her career with All-Patriot League recognition and for Kate Ruda, Meiko Boynton and Lindsey Gentel it raises the bar for them next season. And, I think we have a few more players who are capable of garnering such recognition next season," Lewis said.

The team ended their season with a final record of 7-12.

"Regarding this senior class—Kelly Burrows, Amy Marvel, Sonja Wettergreen—they have made significant contributions to this program over four years and I'm grateful for all they have given," Lewis said. "While they will be missed by their teammates and coaches, they have left a lasting impression and that's a tribute to them. I wish them nothing but success in the future as they have represented Bucknell well the past four seasons."

Lewis is proud of the team's accomplishments.

"I think it's a tremendous accomplishment for such a young team to reach the Patriot League Tournament as one of the top four teams in the league. Obviously, that is our goal every season and I was proud of this team's effort to manage so much adversity throughout the season and still be one of the top four," Lewis said. "I think the weekend was great exposure for our young kids in terms of what it actually takes to be a Patriot League champion. We can only build on this experience and work to get a bit better for next year."

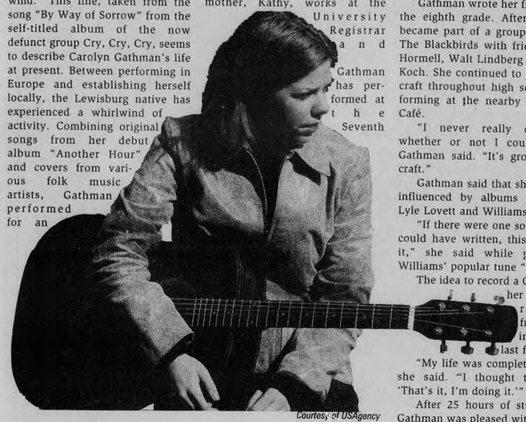
Gathman sings unique program

Lewisburg native performs songs from her debut CD

By Kristi Johnston
A&E Editor

"You've been taken by the wind." This line, taken from the song "By Way of Sorrow" from the self-titled album of the now defunct group Cry, Cry, Cry, seems to describe Carolyn Gathman's life at present. Between performing in Europe and establishing herself locally, the Lewisburg native has experienced a whirlwind of activity. Combining original songs from her debut album "Another Hour" and covers from various folk music artists, Gathman performed for an enthusiastic crowd at the Seventh Street Café last Friday night.



Courtesy of USAgency

Carolyn Gathman performed at the Seventh Street Café last Friday night. Gathman's style has been compared to Dar Williams and Sarah McLachlan.

Gathman's sound has been compared to that of Dar Williams, an artist who has truly inspired her. She combines light, flowing melodies and provocative lyrics to provide a truly expressive and rich musical showcase.

She recently had the opportunity to perform in various bars and pubs throughout the United Kingdom.

She also did some busking (playing in a public place for donations) while there.

Gathman, currently a Susquehanna University student, has ties to the University. Her mother, Kathy, works at the University Registrar and Gathman has performed at the Seventh Street Café in the past.

Last weekend, Gathman performed several original works from "Another Hour," including "Remains of a Stranger" and "The Easiest Thing." She also played covers by some of her favorite artists, including Williams, Jennifer Knapp and Sarah McLachlan.

"I like [her style] because it is similar to McLachlan's," Carolyn Pacala '05 said. "It's quiet, passionate and insightful."

Gathman has been singing for many years and learned to play the guitar to accommodate her talent.

"It's a lot handier than toting around a piano," she said.

Gathman wrote her first song in the eighth grade. After that, she became part of a group known as The Blackbirds with friends Sarah Hormell, Walt Lindberg and Penny Koch. She continued to perfect her craft throughout high school, performing at the nearby My House Café.

"I never really questioned whether or not I could do it," Gathman said. "It's grown into a craft."

Gathman said that she has been influenced by albums from both Lyle Lovett and Williams.

"If there were one song I wish I could have written, this would be it," she said while performing Williams' popular tune "Iowa."

The idea to record a CD came to her after she returned from studying abroad last fall.

"My life was completely open," she said. "I thought to myself, 'That's it, I'm doing it.'"

After 25 hours of studio time, Gathman was pleased with the final product. "Another Hour" is available in the Bookstore.

"'Another Hour' was written as a remedy for my own impatience," Gathman said of the song for which the album was named. "I was waiting for someone to pick me up and made up a story about it."

Though she's made a name for herself in the local area, Gathman does not have immediate plans to go on tour.

"My plan for the future is to finish college," she said. "If I were to put [music] first, that wouldn't happen. Eventually, it will be a big part of what I do, even if it's not all of what I do."

"Punch Drunk Love" is intoxicating Sandler showcase

By Melissa Farrar
Senior Writer

"Punch Drunk Love," written and directed by Paul Thomas Anderson ("Boogie Nights," "Magnolia") is a dazzlingly odd but enjoyable spectacle. Though it lacks the complexity of the large ensemble casts common to Anderson's other works, "Punch Drunk Love" delivers a satisfying plot and character-driven tale.

Barry Egan (Adam Sandler) is a socially inept salesman for a California toilet plunger business. In an impressive turn, Sandler maintains his usual childlike voice and mannerisms, but with true purpose. Egan is a pathetic character with deeply hidden rage and sadness. Sandler aptly expresses this inner turmoil through subtle facial contortions and soft mumbles.

Egan has seven loud sisters who constantly overwhelm him with phone calls and ridicule his odd behavior. He expresses his frustration by smashing things or randomly bursting into tears. He spends his free time reading the fine print on contest labels and discovers an oversight that would allow him to rack up over one million miles' worth of air travel with the purchase of $3,000 worth of Healthy Choice pudding.

On a particularly lonely night, Egan calls a phone sex operator, who senses his vulnerability and attempts to blackmail him. A sleazy mattress salesman from Utah (Phillip Seymour Hoffman) owns the phone sex business and sends some thugs to California to beat Egan up. Frightened and angry, Egan desperately looks for a way out.

Movie Review

Many of Egan's moments of panic are hard for the viewer to decipher. Are we supposed to laugh or feel sorry for him? Either way, the misunderstood protagonist solicits our full attention.

Egan forgets his troubles when he meets Lena (Emily Watson), a quirky, sweet woman who works with one of his sisters. A series of awkward but tender moments ensues between the two. Egan goes berserk on their first date and vandalizes a bathroom, but Lena still finds him charming. Soon after, he tracks her down in Hawaii where she is on a business trip. His attempt to put his frequent flyer miles toward the trip fails, but he realizes that he has fallen for Lena.

Although the love story is simple, Anderson never allows it to become predictable. The pair is a perfect mismatch that just somehow fits. The camera visuals add to their chemistry, with a number of close-up shots and strange, colorful transitions. Though the film fails to fully develop Lena's character, Watson's performance gives us the illusion that there is perhaps something more to her.

Lena gives Egan a reason to let go of his anger and unhappiness and ultimately stand up for himself. Though not a flawless film, "Punch Drunk Love" is unique and purely entertaining.

Silhouettes blend solos and harmony

All-female a capella group welcomes Johns Hopkins All-Nighters to its concert

By David Allen
Staff Writer

Katie Kohn—The Bucknellian

Molly Campbell '03 performs a solo during the Silhouettes' performance. The group gave a concert last Saturday in Bucknell Hall as part of the Homecoming Weekend festivities.

The Silhouettes, the University's all-female a capella group, performed two sets of songs bracketed by the All-Nighters, an all-male a capella group from Johns Hopkins University, last Saturday night.The group has traditionally prided themselves on providing its listeners with a blend of harmony and stand-out solos.

The first set by the Silhouettes consisted of four songs, blending the voices of all 13 group members and using vocalized percussion .

The group's first song, LeAnn Rimes' "Can't Fight the Moonlight," was driven by this vocal percussion in support of soloist Kim Hallman '04. The Silhouettes' cover of Lifehouse's "Breathing" featured more understated beats and was held aloft by dramatic shifts from minor to major chords.

During Deanna Carter's "We Danced Anyway," a soprano counterline in the chorus provided the background to the solo. The group balanced the ensemble against soloist Leanne Meriton '05 during U2's "Still Haven't Found What I'm Looking For," a song that has not traditionally been sung by a female voice.

The Silhouettes then welcomed their guests to the stage. The group from Johns Hopkins generated a very big sound for only nine performers and sang with energy and expression. Despite a few errors with the lyrics of its opening song, Green Day's "Longview," the group captured the audience's attention with mimed drumming as it delivered its vocal percussion parts.

The All-Nighters' set was made up of rock and alternative songs from the 1990s, with the exception of Simon and Garfunkel's "Scarborough Fair." Their rendition of this classic song was faithful to the original. There was also a handbell-like effect of call and response between the soloist and the supporting voices.

Other strong and interesting spots in the All-Nighters' set included the use of different syllables and shifts in tempo of the Goo Goo Dolls' "Name," vocalizing the guitar solo of Weezer's "Island in the Sun" and the abrupt starts and stops of Dispatch's "The General."

After the show, Allison Hoffmann '05 praised the amount of energy and movement that the All-Nighters put into their performance. The All-Nighters left the stage to enthusiastic applause and handed the show back over to their hosts.

The first song the Silhouettes sang upon returning, Billy Joel's "And So It Goes," featured neither a soloist nor vocal percussion. The group surrounded the audience rather than standing on stage as they sang, and the harmonies and resolution of suspended chords could be heard shifting from one side of the group to the other.

The group returned to the stage for the remainder of its performance. Its first four songs all exhibited balance between soloist and group, particularly during Mariah Carey's "Always Be My Baby" and the Dixie Chicks' "Cowboy, Take Me Away."

The group's rendition of Guster's "Demons" infused the subdued original with a gospel-style energy. Its creative approach was evident in the vocal impersonation of the song's guitar introduction, mid-song guitar break and hand drumming.

For their last song, Rod Stewart's "Drift Away," the Silhouettes invited alumni in attendance to come on stage with them. This song was propelled by a soulful, spiritual element.

Gray's new CD expresses emotion

By Leah Cunningham
Staff Writer

Emerging from the darkness, Englishman David Gray makes headway with his newly released album "A New Day at Midnight." Still centrally based on the pains of love, loss and grief from his last hit album, "White Ladder," Gray dramatically emphasizes the estranged illusion of melancholy lyrics and soft, rhythmic music that eludes his previously released songs. "A New Day at Midnight" is a rebirth of both Gray's intensity and his lulling style.

Within the music world, Gray has been a ghost for the past four years as "White Ladder" went double platinum in the United States, while album sales topped 2.2 million in the United Kingdom.

Conventional is a word that hardly assesses Gray's talent, as the dramatic tone of his music keeps his work lingering and admirable. Gray attributes the general tone of his songs to his father's death and his own losses of love throughout life.

This record is serious, with a solemn yet passionate overtone. From its opener, "Dead in the Water," the listener is confronted by a lonesome atmosphere with a sense of hope. Consistent throughout the album is a mellow denominator, which expresses the message of every song. "Caroline" most specifically resembles Gray's style as recalled in "White Ladder's" hit, "Babylon."

From Gray's poetic album title "A New Day at Midnight" to the wonder stemming from his more ambivalent lyrics throughout each song, Gray continues to have a knack for mystery. The songs yield the same enigma as Coldplay's album "Parachute," in that you cannot avoid playing the songs over and over again, making subtle attempts to find the meanings of Gray's metaphors and incorporated stories.

As a whole, "A New Day at Midnight" is inspirational. It is one of those albums that provokes a certain mood and draws emotion through Gray's mix of fervent choruses and emotional lyrics.

"Be Mine" is an exhausted, love-stricken song with sparks of an anticipated vision of hope, and "The Other Side" concludes the album with a proposal about grief and understanding, perhaps about death, love or both. These ballads, along with "Easy Way to Cry," are where Gray takes the stage and shows that he has saved his most moving songs for a powerful conclusion.

CD Review

A general sense of wonder throughout the entire album leaves you relaxed with a level of comfort. Intimacy and profound lyrics parallel the themes of change, loss, love and grief portrayed not only in "A New Day at Midnight," but also in "White Ladder." Gray has no limit and no threshold for conformity, but rather embodies his music with literal and musical meaning. "A New Day at Midnight" is bound to be as successful if not more so than "White Ladder," as Gray uses his talents to produce an exceptional album, one that is deeper and darker than he has ever put forth.

Eminem brings the struggles of his early life to the screen in "8-Mile"

By Ken Holroyd
Staff Writer

A man is in the bathroom of what appears to be a locker room in a hooded sweatshirt and headphones, bouncing back and forth as if getting ready for a prize fight. When he walks out on stage, he is not fighting, but battling in a freestyle rap competition based on how well you can insult your opponent in 45 seconds.

In his movie "8 Mile," Director Curtis Hanson shows us a screenwriter's adaptation of an Eminem interview. The controversial rapper tells of the conditions he lived in while growing up. As the film is loosely based on his own life, Eminem was cast in the lead role of Jimmy "B. Rabbit" Smith Jr.

Smith is an aspiring rapper living in the area around 8 Mile Rd. in Detroit. The movie opens with a rap battle, which he loses horribly. Over the next week, Smith has to deal with a low-end job at an automobile factory, gang wars, racial tension and family issues.

He has recently left his girlfriend, who says she is pregnant, and in doing so left her his car and the apartment that they shared. He now has to move back into the mobile home community where his mother and his very young sister live.

When he gets there, he walks in on his mother (Kim Basinger) having sex with one of his former classmates. A fight ensues that wakes up his sister. We learn that Smith treats his sister much like a remarkably loving father, a complete reversal from the rage of emotions he displays only seconds before. This is most likely a representation of Eminem's attitude toward his own daughter.

Movie Review

Like those around him, Smith desperately wants to rise above his social status, but he seems to be the only one whose goals are remotely realistic. One friend pressures him about his connections, while another says the only way out is through the battles.

Meanwhile, Smith is pressing bumpers to earn money for studio time to record a demo. He works on his lyrics, but proves that he is also quite adept at improvisation. His only problem to overcome is stage fright. He seems to be the only person who truly thinks about the way the world works and how he can make his own mark on it.

Eminem's performance is nothing short of astonishing. Granted, the character is autobiographical, so he should have had an easy time assuming the role, but his emotional responses to various situations, such as his mother complaining about her sex life, appear to be very real. The camera work is very reminiscent of a "Rocky" film, and the underdog storyline is very much like "Finding Forrester."

This film is about race and class issues in the slums of Detroit. One young man must fight against daunting odds to make his way into circles that don't want him, and with a less than supportive base to work from. In order to accomplish this, he must come to terms with where he comes from, what goes on in his relationships and what he must do to succeed in the world.

The film is very realistic and the character has many personal faults, but that does not stop the viewer from hoping that he will succeed. An incredibly in-your-face film, it holds up well against the skepticism of Eminem that anyone might previously hold.

Chorale and orchestra concert enjoyable

By Meghan Ball
Writer

Last Sunday afternoon, both the University Concert Chorale and the Chamber Orchestra took the stage at the Weis Center for a Homecoming Weekend concert. The performance included "Deep Sleep" by Bill Douglas , "Quatre Motests Sur Thèmes Grégoriens" and, "Requiem, Op. 9," both by Maurice Duruflé.

The chorale began with "Deep Sleep," a slow, moving song that set the tone for the rest of the concert. The audience sat back in its seats to listen to a long, melodic performance.

"I thought the performance was very different from most chorale performances I've been to in the past," Monica McMurrer '06 said. "It was very soothing. The mix of the chorus and the accompaniment was flawless. At times, it was a little long-winded, but overall, it was very enjoyable."

For "Requiem, Op. 9," the chamber orchestra joined the chorale to produce a beautiful and strong piece.

"I was rather impressed with the performance as a whole," Kristen Hughes '06 said. "It exceeded my expectations. I thought the strings were a lovely addition to the voices."

In addition, two soloists joined the song—Faculty Assistant Martha Gibbs Hill and Todd Griffith, an alumnus of the chorale.

"The soloists both had amazingly powerful voices. I enjoyed watching the emotion [Griffith] put into his songs," Tiffany Stout '06 said.

The performers seemed satisfied with their work as a whole. They appeared to be pleased with the warm applause that followed the final piece.

"Overall I was really happy with the performance," Emily Serrotta '06 said. "I think it was a good representation of how we sounded in rehearsal."

Peak performance: climbing Mount Kilimanjaro

By Ashley Maliken
Staff Writer

Mountain climbing has become a popular extreme sport of our era. People love the challenge of facing the tallest natural structures known to man and conquering them with only raw talent and willpower. Rarely do these individuals undertake such a physically and mentally grueling task without proper experience and training. Shamik Chande '03 did just that last summer when he climbed Mount Kilimanjaro, located in the northernmost point of Tanzania. He had never done any real mountain climbing before, aside from some simple hiking excursions, yet he decided to climb one of the tallest peaks in the world.

One of the Seven Natural Wonders of the World, Mount Kilimanjaro is the tallest free-standing mountain in the world and the highest point on the African continent. A national park of Tanzania, the mountain is 19,340 feet high with its climates ranging from a tropical rain forest at the first level to a freezing desert at the peak.

Hikers can choose from the eight trails up the mountain, ranging in level of difficulty, and for as little as $500, can attempt to reach the top. That price is all inclusive, covering the required guide, food and housing at each stopping point, as well as porters to carry your equipment through the duration of the trip. Chances are slim that such adventurous individuals will be successful in their endeavors; even with top-rate equipment and training, only 7 percent of those who try ever reach the ice-capped summit known as Uhuru Peak.

When Chande decided to climb Mount Kilimanjaro last summer, it was a complete spur of the moment decision. His uncle had reached the summit 40 years earlier, and since then all members of his family who tried, including his father, had been unsuccessful in their quest for the peak. After completing a spring session abroad in Europe, Chande headed to Africa. July is the winter month in the Southern Hemisphere, so the climbing weather was ideal—it was not the rainy season, snow at the top would not hinder his trek and the temperature would be neither too hot nor too cold.

Packing up his "equipment," consisting only of his uncle's hiking boots from 40 years earlier, Chande hired a guide and was assigned to a group with three other men. The route they selected, Marangu, was an easier five-day journey that offered the luxury of huts to sleep in at each resting point. Chande began his trip around 10 a.m. on the first day, reaching Gilman's Point by 4 p.m.

"Nothing beat the view there. On one side the mountain looked like a glacier, and the other side looked like the craters of the moon," Chande said.

After resting overnight in the tropical climate of the first peak, the group began the second day. The second night was spent in a savannah-like climate among the clouds. At that elevation, the air begins to thin out, and breathing becomes more of a task. The rest of his party decided to take an extra day to acclimate, but Chande braved ahead despite his lack of proper preparation.

"Normally people train for six months [to get ready for the change in altitude]. I only trained for two weeks after leaving England. But the longer you rest the harder it is to get going again, so I decided not to wait," Chande said.

Adjusting to the altitude is very important when climbing because the side effects are enough to turn any hiker around early. Symptoms include nausea, headaches and breathlessness; drinking at least four liters of water a day is a good way to combat such ill effects. The temperature can also take its toll on the body. At the higher elevations, the nights get colder with the daytime weather remaining rather temperate.

The third day was the roughest of the trip; there was hardly any time to rest. Chande, his guide and the porters climbed to the third resting point, arriving around 3 p.m., and rested for only a few hours. The climb to the peak has to be made at night, so that the terrain is frozen and there is no threat of ice or snow falling. At midnight they left the last hut and began the final ascent to the top. Only Chande and his guide went, leaving the porters at camp. They climbed through the night and reached the peak at 8:30 a.m. on the fourth day.

"Nothing beat the view from the top. On one side you could see Kenya, on the other side another mountain range, and the planes that flew overhead were so close," Chande said.

Though they only remained at the top for about 10 minutes, Chande took the time to call a few friends and his parents on his cell phone, which was still surprisingly functional, to tell them of his accomplishment.

"I never expected to get to the top. I had no proper gear and only one roll of film," Chande said.

The trip down proved to be rougher than anticipated, as Chande's boots were not adequate for the trip, causing his toes to take quite a beating. He later learned that his uncle had been carried down after his successful journey to the top, so his boots had never been properly broken in. In addition to a few broken toe nails, he also had severe sunburn that cost him a layer of skin from his face. As a result of drinking nearly frozen water for two days, Chande also had strep throat. He feels the trip was completely worth the minor harms he suffered.

"It is inspiration. Pure willpower got me to the top, and when you achieve such heights nothing else is beyond you," Chande said.

As a constant reminder of his adventure, Chande keeps a photo of himself at the summit next to his desk at all times.

Next year, he plans to make the trip again, this time taking a few close friends along so they can also experience the natural beauty and pure inspiration this world has to offer.

Sigma Chi hosts dance at Lewisburg Middle School

By Elisabeth Hulette
Writer

Chaos ensued at Lewisburg Middle School last Friday evening as sixth-, seventh- and eighth-graders gleefully sprinted through the halls, dressed to the nines in their best jeans, sneakers and glitter body gel. While the school's energy level may have been high enough to merit a small riot, the situation was thankfully a much happier one—Sigma Chi was hosting a school dance.

As part of the University's community service requirement for fraternities and sororities, Sigma Chi organized the dance to benefit the Lewisburg Listening Post (LPP), an organization that works with peer mediation at Lewisburg Middle School and at the Linntown School next door. Sigma Chi became involved with the LPP partially through Director of Student Health Dr. Donald Stechschulte, its University adviser. His wife, Cathy, serves as one of the group's coordinators.

"[LLP] places a focus on primary prevention, helping kids by providing an extra listening ear," Cathy Stechschulte said.

Several of the brothers also work as Near Peers, older students who interact with the kids during lunch and after classes in the LLP office at each school. Some of the Near Peers also tutor the students in their academics. According to Cathy Stechschulte, the fourth- through eighth-grade students have been responding well to the program since it was first instated in 1978.

Sigma Chi President R.J. Grant '03 said the brothers chose to run the dance because it posed a much more interesting opportunity than the other community service events that are usually offered to Greeks. The fraternity provided chaperones, hired the disc jockey and sold tickets at the middle school for $3, directing the proceeds to the LLP.

It is not surprising that even with all the work that went into planning the event, the kids seemed far too wrapped up in having fun to notice who was sponsoring their dance and why. The boys seemed to find a safe haven in the gym, which had been set up with basketball equipment. The majority of their female counterparts congregated in the cafeteria, where the disc jockey spun tunes from disco and "YMCA" to Avril Lavigne's "Sk8er Boi" and Destiny's Child. The 25 Sigma Chi brothers in attendance lurked in the corners of both areas and monitored the hallways as the kids zoomed their way between rooms.

If you think kids have changed so much in recent times, this dance just might give you evidence to the contrary. The girls are still braiding their hair just like so many of us once did, the boys still think it's cool to wear their baseball caps backward and they still decorate the cafeteria with the traditional crepe-paper-and-balloon motif. On the dance floor the girls giggle to each other more than they dance, looking around the room as the boys stand shyly by the wall. Occasionally a whole group of kids will run across the room to mob the disc jockey to request a song.

If this sounds familiar enough to be your first junior high dance, isn't it nice to know some things never change? Sigma Chi, by donating the dance's profits to LPP, has not only provided the students with a traditional school dance experience, but also a place to be heard.

Alum's bright idea: LightWedge

By Caitlin McKee
Staff Writer

Does your roommate turn off all the lights and go to sleep while you're still awake and trying to read? Well, good news. Your problem is solved and you can thank Jamey Bennett '90 for creating the solution. Bennett's creation is called the LightWedge.

"The LightWedge is a transparent, lighted pane of optical acrylic material that you lay flat on the page of a book. It delivers bright, white light evenly across the whole page without spilling any light into the room you are in. It's perfect for when you need to read and your roommate wants to sleep," Bennett said.

Bennett's brilliant idea for the LightWedge came from an unsuspecting source, a beer sign.

"The idea for LightWedge came from a plastic Schaeffer Beer sign. It had a logo etched in a sheet of plexiglass. When one edge was lighted, just the logo lit up—not the whole piece of plexiglass. I figured you could get the whole sheet of plexiglass to glow if you made it in the shape of a wedge instead of a flat sheet."

Bennett put his idea to the test and was surprisingly pleased with the results.

"I bought a hunk of plexiglass and sawed it into a wedge shape in my garage. I polished it up and, to my amazement, it worked," Bennett said.

The LightWedge has come a long way from Bennett's garage. Big name stores, including Barnes & Noble and Borders, carry the LightWedge. The product is flying off the shelves.

"It hit the shelf in every Barnes & Noble store on Aug. 1, just a few months ago. It is doing very well there, and at Borders and many other retailers," Bennett said.

According to Bennett, he knew his product was a success when a buyer from Barnes and Noble instantly responded to his LightWedge prototype.

"Before I invested a lot of money into design and manufacturing last year, I went to see the guy who runs all of the Barnes & Noble stores," Bennett said. "When I turned off the lights and switched on my prototype, he just said 'Ahh.' Then he picked up the phone and called Barnes & Noble's senior buyer and told her she needed to come to his office and see what he was seeing. They loved it."

Everyone seems to love the LightWedge. Bucknellians in the business world have expressed their love for the product through financial support.

"LightWedge's list of investors includes no less than six Bucknellians, ranging in vintage from the class of 1954 to the class of 1990. A Bucknellian helped me get the LightWedge onto the QVC," Bennett said.

Bennett also supports fellow Bucknellians in his own business practice.

"I try to do business with Bucknellians whenever I can. I invested in a company started by a Bucknellian, and I serve on its board of directors. I plan to hire a University intern next summer," Bennett said.

The support Bennett gives to Bucknellians stems from his appreciation for the University.

"I think Bucknell gave me a great foundation. Critical thinking, writing communication, collaboration and leadership are all skills my time at Bucknell helped me to develop whether I knew it at the time or not," Bennett said.

The skills Bennett learned from the University have guided him along a very successful business career. Immediately after graduating from the University, Bennett landed a job with the Center for Entrepreneurial Studies and Development, an affiliate of West Virginia University (WVU). While working at the Center, Bennett helped companies develop their businesses. He also managed to start a publishing operation for WVU. This operation marked the beginning of Bennett's long business relationship with publishing.

His business work has helped to re-engineer the direct marketing process of publishing. In 1994, Bennett drafted a business plan for a project called Book Wire. Book Wire has evolved into a clearinghouse of information for the entire book publishing industry. While busy working on Book Wire, Bennett spent his free time creating a business plan for LendingTree.com. Bennett extensively involves himself in the business world, because he finds it very gratifying.

"I love convincing people to do something new, then making money from it. It is very gratifying to see thousands or millions of people using the product or service you invented and knowing you are making a buck or two on every sale," Bennett said.

University faces budget discrepancy

By Elisabeth Salemme
Staff Writer

The University is suffering from discrepancies in the budget this year, University President Steffen Rogers said at the November faculty meeting.

"It is normal to have the budget out of balance at this time of year. What is unique about this year as compared to previous years is the fact that we used to look at new expenses we would be unable to fund, and right now we are looking at what existing expenses we would be unable to fund," Rogers said.

According to Rogers, the imbalance in the budget has come about for a variety of reasons.

"A lot of things have coalesced at the same time, including the market problems. The good news is that we have a good-sized endowment,

Wagner elected mayor by Borough Council

Judy Wagner sworn in Tuesday evening replacing late, longtime Lewisburg Mayor Lewis Hendricks Jr.

By Rachel Laskow
Editor-in-Chief

Judy Wagner made history on Tuesday night when the Borough Council elected her as the first female mayor of Lewisburg. The council voted 5-1 in favor of Wagner, who is assuming the position of mayor after the death of Lewis Hendricks Jr. on Nov. 7.

"I am very happy to have the opportunity and I am happy my colleagues supported me," Wagner said.

Wagner served approximately seven years on council as a Ward 3 representative and was vice president. Because mayor is a part time job, Wagner will continue to work as a guidance counselor at Linntown Elementary School.

Borough Council President John Baker has known Wagner as a neighbor, council member and now as mayor, and he is pleased with the council's choice.

"It is a positive move and she will do a good job for everyone. It's a win-win-win all the way around," Baker said.

Borough Manager David Clouser believes that Wagner will be a wonderful mayor because of the great qualities she has, such as getting out and meeting people.

"She tries to be a bridge between different factions of the community and is looking for civility within the community and the council itself," Clouser said.

As mayor, Wagner wants to reach out to all segments of the community to deal with issues such as the budget, housing and drug-related incidents.

"We all have to work together to make the borough a safe place," Wagner said.

Wagner also hopes to further the goals of the borough and keep the pulse of the community alive.

"I believe in win-win situations. You only get there if you sit down and talk to people," Wagner said.

One group of people that Wagner feels is an important part of the community is University students. She plans to work with the task force to maintain and improve town-gown relations.

"My whole agenda is to improve civility

Freedom of speech debates plague universities nationwide

By Alyson Walker
Features Editor

Recently, two universities have been grappling with freedom of speech issues. Harvard University's student newspaper, Harbus, printed a cartoon negatively depicting the university's computer system, creating an uproar of protest from administration, and resulting in the resignation of Harbus' editor-in-chief. On the other end of the spectrum, West Virginia University (WVU) dropped its policy that limited free speech zones to certain outdoor areas.

According to CNN.com, the Harvard incident occurred after computer difficulties altered students' interview schedules for corporate recruiting sessions. The cartoon was published in Harbus and showed a career services Web site bombarded with error messages. One of the errors mentioned "incompetent morons."

Two student editors were informed by the director of the MBA program that the cartoon was "disrespectful" and were chastised for publishing it. Editor-in-Chief Nick Wills resigned, telling The Boston Globe it was because of "personal intimidation and threats" by Harvard officials.

The officials state that there was no intention to stifle free speech—just to uphold the "community standards" code. The cartoon violated this campus code because it insulted employees of the career services program.

"If it weren't for those two words, nothing would have been said or done to the students," MBA Chairperson Carl Kester said, according to The Campus Theatre encourages exploration of society and cultures

Venue hosts U.S. premiere of "Divine Intervention"; first screening of controversial "Bowling for Columbine" today

By Jennifer Jenchura
Senior Writer

The Campus Theatre hosted the U.S. premiere of the 2002 Cannes Film Festival Jury Prize Winner film, "Divine Intervention," directed by Elia Suleiman, on Tuesday evening.

Located on Market Street in downtown Lewisburg, the Campus Theatre debuted the film as part of Middle Eastern Film Festival, a six-day festival of Middle Eastern films that were shown from Nov. 15-21. The film festival was a joint effort among the University, Susquehanna University, Campus Theatre and the Degenstein Foundation, a Sunbury foundation that generously supports arts and education. The festival featured films from Iran, Israel, Afghanistan and Palestine.

Originally, Suleiman's film "Chronicle of a Disappearance" was scheduled to be shown. The Campus Theatre was able to acquire the director's newest and critically acclaimed film "Divine Intervention" in its place after the studio behind "Chronicle of a Disappearance" revealed the earlier film would be unavailable due to damages.

Campus Theatre owner and University Professor of English Eric Faden credits Mary Bannon, the theater's director, with bringing the film to Lewisburg.

"The thanks go to the tireless efforts of Mary Bannon. She had originally brought that film to my attention since it won the Grand Jury Prize at this year's Cannes Film Festival. Unfortunately, we realized that it would not be available until January," Faden said.

"Divine Intervention" was not scheduled to be released in the United States until Jan. 17, 2003, but due to the circumstances, "Divine Intervention" distributor Avatar Films invited the Campus Theatre to hold an exclusive screening before the film opens in New York at the Angelika Film Center next year.

"Since we desperately needed a film, the studio for 'Divine Intervention' decided, after some skillful negotiation on our part, to release 'Divine Intervention' to us for the festival," Faden said.

Preparations for this festival began last August. Because "Divine Intervention" was not being released until January, the theatre did not originally consider asking the studio for the film. "We decided it was worth a shot to try after we realized last Friday we could not get 'Chronicle of a Disappearance,'" Bannon said. "Because the premiere of 'Divine Intervention' is on short notice, there is no red carpet. However, we did advertise at both Susquehanna and Bucknell. So far the films in this festival have done as well as any other independent film."

The University Middle Eastern Association (MEA) helped with advertising the film on campus through posters, word of mouth and by giving away free tickets in the Langone Center.

Nora Abdullah '03 coordinated the promotions.

"I was more than thrilled, but frankly quite shocked, to see the arrival of this film festival here in Lewisburg. It's a wonderful opportunity for the Bucknell and Lewisburg community to learn about the Middle East, and I really hope that they are taking advantage of it," Abdullah said.

Faden introduced the film before it began.

The film involves a love story that takes place between two Palestinians—a man living in Jerusalem and a woman living in Ramallah. The man, played by Suleiman, shifts between his ailing father and his love life, trying to keep both alive. Utilizing breathtaking special effects and animation, "Divine Intervention" shows the dreams and

The Campus Theatre, owned and operated by Assistant Professor of English Eric Faden, hosted a Middle Eastern Film Festival this week, premiering the film "Divine Intervention," directed by Elia Suleiman. Starting today, the theatre will be showing the film "Bowling for Columbine," directed by Michael Moore.

"Bowling for Columbine," a new Michael Moore film, opens tonight in the Campus Theatre. This movie, a humorous, yet thoughtful documentary, attempts to answer questions about guns and violence in America.

Assistant Professor of English Eric Faden owns the Campus Theatre. When he first saw the movie, he was very impressed by it.

"I saw it a few weeks ago and thought it was brilliant, thought-provoking and hysterically funny," Faden said. "This film will entertain people, but it will also make people think—and that's something really rare in contemporary American cinema."

Although this movie deals with American violence, it examines the issue in an amusing manner.

"I think it tries to approach the issue of violence from a really honest perspective. Essentially, the director, Michael Moore ['Roger and Me'], asks, 'Why is America so violent?' and then, often humorously, tries to find an answer by interviewing everyone from Charlton Heston [the NRA spokesman], to survivors of the Columbine shooting, to Matt Stone of "South Park" [who graduated from Columbine High School]," Faden said.

Instead of simply providing an answer to this issue, the film forces the audience to deal with the problem.

"The simple 'sound bite' explanations for our violent society—video games, Marilyn Manson, sex and violence in American cinema, access to guns, etc.—are critically examined in a profound way," Faden said. "The film is very comfortable in saying that there is no easy answer. Rather than try to provide a simple answer, it's more interested in getting people to think critically about the issue themselves."

The movie explores the broader issue of American violence, but its title stems from the fact that only a few hours before the 1999 Columbine High School

Chi Omega hosts Walk-for-a-Wish

By Jaclyn Carr
Staff Writer

There is a 12-year-old girl named Amanda in Mifflinburg who has acute lymphocytic leukemia and has a wish to go to Hawaii. Chi Omega and its national philanthropy, the Make-A-Wish Foundation, hope to grant this wish by hosting their first annual Walk-for-a-Wish program in the Gerhard Fieldhouse on Sunday from 1-4 p.m.

Organizations and individuals will walk a mile around the track and be asked to pledge money that will hopefully give Amanda her wish.

The Make-A-Wish Foundation grants the wishes of children affected with life-threatening illnesses throughout the world. With the generosity of private donors and more than 20,000 volunteers worldwide, the foundation has been able to grant 97,000 wishes around the world since its inception in 1980.

There are 80 chapters in the United States and its territories and 22 international affiliates, making the Make-A-Wish Foundation the largest wish-granting organization in the world.

The Mideastern Pennsylvania chapter located in Pottsville, which the Walk-a-Wish proceeds will benefit, began in 1985 and has granted 450 wishes in its 17-year history. It now anticipates fulfilling 59 wishes annually. The chapter becomes aware of a child's wish through wish referrals, which can be made by a parent, legal guardian or medical professional.

The goal of the foundation is to provide the wish-child and family with a lifetime memory, without concern for costs. The average cost of granting a wish with the Pennsylvania chapter is $4,400, and the support of Chi Omega and other co-sponsors could be enough to achieve this goal.

"I think the walk will be a big success and I am looking forward to seeing lots of support through the week and on Sunday," Chi Omega Director of Community Service Loren Cohen '03 said.

Amanda might even make a special appearance at the event.

"I spoke with Amanda's mother and she said she will try to make it pending on how she is feeling. Cross your fingers that she is up to the event," said Marisa Campanici, special events coordinator at the Make-A-Wish Pennsylvania chapter.

but the bad news is that it's subject to going up and down with the market," Rogers said.

Rogers said that when he arrived at the University, the endowment was approximately $441 million, and at the end of September this year it was about $306 million.

Rogers said the difficulties with fundraising have posed a problem for the University budget.

"When we're trying to get donations, people are also watching their portfolios disintegrate. People are not in the same position financially as they were," Rogers said.

Rogers recently spent time on Wall Street and spoke with many people regarding the market.

"I talked to a number of people and their point was, Wall Street doesn't like uncertainty and we don't know at this point if we're going to go to war with Iraq, and that's a big issue," Rogers said. "People are still concerned with whatever scandal might pop up like Enron, and this big concern about earnings and purchasing. This uncertainty goes into trying to raise money."

Rogers said another reason for the unbalance is the fact that many new expenses have come in at one time, including the budgets for the four new buildings, and possibly a new engineering building.

"There is no new money and the budgets are going down instead of going up and we have to find a new way to cover the costs of those buildings," Rogers said.

In addition, Rogers said the cost of insurance keeps going up at a rapid rate.

"When you put all of these [factors] together, and other little things—and when I say little, I mean $100,000 here and $200,000 there—it all adds up. We want to keep tuition rates reasonable and we want to give raises to our faculty and staff that at least cover inflation," Rogers said. "You put all of that together and you get a budget that is, on one side heavily personnel, so it's not like you can maneuver within the budget very much because we have people making salaries. On the other side you are trying to keep the expenses reasonable. The other way is fundraising and we know the parents are looking at their portfolios as well, so we don't want to raise tuition drastically."

Rogers said that the end result is that the administration is going to have to take a careful look at the bottom line for next year.

"We are going to have to make some adjustments, some where we haven't even started to think about. We don't know what the adjustments will be yet because we're not quite sure what the size of the problem is at this point, but it is going to be significant," Rogers said.

The administration must present a balanced budget to the Board of Trustees at their April meeting.

According to Rogers, the administration will meet with the Board of Trustees this weekend to learn more about where the budget presently stands and what viable options for fixing the problems will be.

"It's also a guessing game," Rogers said. "No one really has a clue what the market is going to be like. If the market was to recover in the next two or three years, that could single-handedly wipe out any budgetary difficulties that we are experiencing right now."

Boston Globe. "There was just a very palpable sense that this had damaged the feelings of people working very hard on behalf of students."

The editors of Harbus claim that the cartoon was critical of the computer system and not a personal attack on personnel.

Last Friday, Dean of Harvard Business School Kim B. Clark sent a message to the campus community regarding freedom of speech and the Harbus cartoon.

"[Harvard Business School is] committed to principles of free expression and inquiry ... each of us first and foremost is a member of the Harvard Business School community, and as such, we are expected to treat each other respectfully," Clark said, according to CNN.com.

Students have had a different reaction to the situation.

"The message the school sent to Nick Wili was pretty threatening," said Jennifer Taylor, a second-year student and member of a board reviewing the case, according to CNN.com. "This is denying the community a voice to express its frustrations."

At WVU, students regained their right to freedom of speech when a policy limiting freedom of speech to certain zones was lifted last week. The ordinance restricted student protests to approximately seven areas that make up 5 percent of the university, which is comprised of 23,000 students. Many outdoor arenas were not included in these zones.

WVU was under pressure of litigation from the Rutherford Institute of Charlottesville, Va., which argued that the free speech zones were a violation of student's freedom of speech. The Board of Governors dropped the policy last Friday, and the Rutherford Institute claimed victory.

"We will continue to monitor the situation on campus for positive signs that the school intends to follow through with the revised policy," Rutherford Institute President John W. Whitehead said, according to CNN.com.

The policy would not allow students to protest corporate recruiters outside of the business school. It was first documented in 1995 in the student handbook, but was rarely enforced.

WVU President David Hardesty told CNN.com that a policy is needed to keep order on campus.

Only one prohibition remains. Students cannot protest within eight feet of another student without his or her consent near the student health service buildings.

within the community," Wagner said.

If the University decides to move students back on campus, Wagner says she is happy to work with the University to facilitate the process. If the University decides against it, she wants to work to improve the neighborhoods.

"I am happy to work in a positive way to get the neighborhoods back on their feet, in terms of appearance and behavior," Wagner said.

Wagner chaired the police committee for seven years and hopes to continue the positive relationship that Hendricks had with the Police Department.

Since Wagner is now mayor, her Ward 3 Council seat is vacant. Anyone interested in serving the position should submit a letter to the Borough offices at 55 S. 5th St.

PATERSON, New Jersey—Bail was doubled for Mohamed el-Atriss, a man accused of providing phony IDs to two of the Sept. 11 hijackers after he was hit with an additional racketeering charge, based on secret evidence the defense was not allowed to hear. El-Atriss already faced 26 counts, including conspiracy, racketeering and manufacturing and distributing phony documents, before the racketeering count—which stems from allegations that he was running an organized criminal enterprise—was filed.

Editor-in-chief reflects on past year

By Rachel Laskow
Editor-in-Chief

Around this time last year, I had to make one of the most difficult decisions of my life: study abroad in Spain or stay at Bucknell and be editor-in-chief of The Bucknellian. I spent weeks listening to advice from friends and family, but most importantly from my predecessor, Pete Van Emburgh '02. He told me that being editor-in-chief was the most rewarding experience of his life. I decided to stay at Bucknell, and while I can't say that going abroad would not have been rewarding, I can now look back at the past year and say Pete was right; being editor-in-chief has been the most rewarding experience of my life.

Perhaps what has made my experience so rewarding is the challenges I've had to face and the means in which I overcame them. The biggest challenge for me was trying to find that delicate balance between providing news to the campus community, pleasing campus organizations and not serving as a PR publication. Throughout the past year, I've learned that every time we decided to cover, or not to cover, a story, we were impacting the campus community. If we chose to run a story, we also had to determine the best manner to present the information. On the other hand, if we chose not to write an article about a particular event, would we not be fulfilling our duty as a newspaper? Making these decisions was not always easy, but in the end, I knew that if I did what was best for the paper, I was doing the right thing.

As I look back at my term as editor-in-chief, I can truly say I am proud of the decisions our staff made and The Bucknellian would not be as successful without the staff constantly striving to cover important and controversial stories. I feel privileged to have been part of a paper that has covered the Sept. 11 attacks, the blackface incident, town-gown relations, merit aid, the living wage and more. More importantly, I feel privileged to be part of a paper that has not been afraid to take a firm stance regarding free speech, role of the Bucknell Student Government and diversity on campus.

I honestly believe that it is our continuous ability to produce a paper each week filled with interesting, well-balanced and unique stories that has garnered us respect throughout the campus community, and even the country. At the summer 2002 Associated Collegiate Press conference, The Bucknellian received first place in the best of show contest among the weekly newspapers. The paper was also awarded a silver medal from the Columbia Scholastic Press Association. Although those national awards are important to me, the positive feedback I receive from the University community means more to me than any national award because it allows me to realize that we are serving and pleasing our primary audience.

The awards and positive feedback prove that The Bucknellian has reached new heights, and that it will continue to reach new heights in the years to come. As the paper has grown over the past year, so have I. I've learned that I could not let the pressure of deadlines, late hours in the office, huge gaps on pages, missing pictures and staff conflicts stop me from putting out the best paper that I possibly could. With every problem, I had to find a solution.

Sandi-Jo Galati—The Bucknellian

Bucknellian* Editor-in-Chief Rachel Laskow '03 proofreads the newspaper before final corrections are made. Laskow will step down as chief editor after this issue. She wishes to thank previous editors and current staff members for their support.

These solutions would not have been possible without the dedication of the Editorial Board, writers, photographers, copy editors and business department. I feel honored to have worked with such an amazing staff. Jolene Hart '03, Laura Day '03, Maureen Oscadal '03 and Jim Leahy '03 all served as valuable assets in their position as managing editors and I thank them for their devotion. The Daily Item, especially Tim Switzer, has been so patient while working with us and has helped us to improve our printing quality. I would also like to thank the Bucknellian Advisory Board for its constant support. During the past year I have realized that the campus community, especially the administration, is truly what makes Bucknell so unique and without all of its cooperation, we would not have been able to cover the stories that we have been.

Most of all, I would like to thank our adviser Jim Lee for guiding me and for his continuous advice about articles, staff conflicts and the newspaper in general. Even after they graduated, former Editor-in-Chief Brian Watson '01 and Pete have acted as my mentors, role models and friends. Without them encouraging me every step of the way, from business and politics layout editor to news layout editor to associate editor and finally to editor-in-chief, I would not be where I am today.

Last, but certainly not least, I would like to thank Jason Rubinstein '04. His constant enthusiasm, immense pride, continuous strive for excellence and incredible patience have made him the perfect associate editor and I could not have dreamed of a more talented and dedicated person to be my co-worker. The paper's success is largely due to Jason's ambition and I can only imagine how he will continue to seek improvements during his term as editor-in-chief.

On the night I was elected as editor-in-chief, Pete wrote to me, "You are at the brink of a humongous change in your life, and I hope you realize this. In one year from today, you will look back and reflect on the personal growth that you will undoubtedly undergo." Again, Pete was right.

Although being editor-in-chief has been the most challenging role I've ever played, it has taught me more about myself and life in general than I ever could have imagined.

"(And to make sure we know he appreciates the magnitude of the tragedy, he gives us a jolting peek at videotapes of Harris and Klebold during their rampage.)"

Despite this controversial peek, some feel that the movie's humor will hopefully encourage more people to watch it, and therefore think about American violence.

"If, through humor, the movie can raise the question in more people's minds of why violence happens in America, I think it will have value," Katy Vertigan '05 said.

nightmares of both the Palestinian and Israeli people living in violent and uncertain times.

The theater usually hosts two to three film festivals per year, but fewer premieres.

"Although the Campus Theatre also hosted the U.S. premiere of the film 'Sunburn' last spring, it is difficult to get nationwide movie premieres at the Theatre because filmmakers want to premiere in big cities," Bannon said.

Students appreciated the opportunity to view a film presenting a different cultural perspective.

"[The festival] is a great chance for students and the local residents to appreciate movies from different cultures and backgrounds in terms of religion and location. I am from Saudi Arabia, a neighbor of Iran, and I haven't seen any Iranian movie up until now," MEA Member Khalid Al Ghamdi '05 said. "I was really excited to watch one to see the similarities and differences between their cultures and ours. I believe the movies are great and honest sources of information about other countries cultures."

"Divine Intervention" was awarded the Jury Prize at 2002 Cannes Film Festival. The Jury is composed of the festival president and includes an equal percentage of women and men—five directors, two actresses, one actor, one writer and one lyricist. The film also received the Silver Hugo Award at the 2002 Chicago International Film Festival and has also been officially selected to appear at other film festivals including Toronto International Film Festival, New York Film Festival and the AFI Film Festival in Los Angeles, Calif.

"The festival was the idea of Laurence Roth at Susquehanna University, and I thought it was a great opportunity for the two universities to work together. We have so many great resources here and the Theatre seemed like a great focal point to showcase movies rarely seen in this part of the world," Faden said. "Since so much of what we 'see' about the Middle East is determined by the American media, we thought it would be interesting to see images of the Middle East, created by people who actually live in the Middle East."

Faden has owned the theater for just over a year and is in the process of turning the theater into a nonprofit organization dedicated to restoring the theater back to its 1940s glory. The theater hopes to continue showing quality films that are not available elsewhere in the area.

If one were to make a quick list of the world's favorite composers, despite his relatively recent vintage (he's only been dead for a century) Peter Ilyich Tchaikovsky would certainly make the list. After all, he composed Swan Lake, which is perhaps the most famous ballet of all time. And there certainly can't be more than a handful of ballet companies that don't stage a production of The Nutcracker every Christmas.

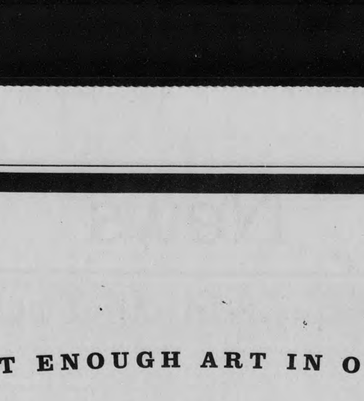
Causes watery eyes. Much like Tchaikovsky's composition "Romeo and Juliet."

And why not? Indeed, this great Romantic composer should be so immortalized. As a young man, he quit a secure government job — at enormous risk and against his father's advice — in order to pursue a career in music. His mild temperament combined with his tendency to work too hard left him with terrible insomnia, debilitating headaches and hallucinations. On top of that, Tchaikovsky's composition teacher never liked his work, even after he became world-famous.

Setbacks such as these could have finished a lesser man. Instead, they informed his work, which remains some of the best loved in history.

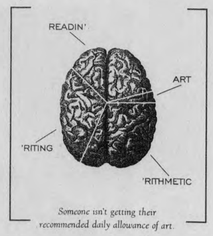


Among the many setbacks Peter Ilyich Tchaikovsky endured: a disapproving family, a loveless marriage, a blind barber.

Yet some children still confuse Tchaikovsky with a nasal spasm.

BLESS YOU, MR. T.

No sensible parent would ever say that arts education isn't important to their child's well-being. Quite the opposite, in fact; when asked, a majority of parents believe the arts are an integral part. They know painting and dance and music and drama help foster analytical thinking, improve overall academic performance, promote a healthy sense of individuality and bolster self-confidence. Not to mention, of course, the obvious creative outlet they provide young minds.



Someone isn't getting their recommended daily allowance of art.

Given all of this, what responsible parent would ever think it's a good idea that their kids spend more time waiting in line in the cafeteria each week than they do in arts classes?

IS THIS SWAN LAKE'S SWAN SONG?

If you think the declining standards in schools today are just the price of doing business, then do nothing. If, on the other hand, you feel this is unacceptable and disadvantageous to your child's welfare, you need to speak up and demand his or her fair share of the arts. To find out how or for more information about all the benefits of arts education, please visit us on the web at AmericansForTheArts.org. Mayor, students should continue to improve town-gown relations

On Tuesday, the Borough Council elected Judy Wagner, former Ward 3 representative and Borough Council vice president, as the new mayor of Lewisburg. Although town-gown relations are better than they were in the past, Wagner should strive to improve relations.

One of the biggest issues facing the University now is the question of whether or not students will have to compietely move back on campus in the near future. Wagner is willing to work with the University to make the process easier if it decides to move students back on campus.

If the University decides against the idea, Wagner hopes to improve the aesthetic and behavioral aspects of the neighborhood.

Either way, Wagner's role is extremely important for both the town and the University. Wagner needs to work to maintain the link between the University and the students. Wagner should start improving relations now so that the link between the two entities is not lost if students are removed from downtown housing.

The Bucknellian encourages the Board of Trustees and the University to continue allowing students to live downtown. Living downtown provides students with the real world experiences of paying bills and living alone. Students should be able to live downtown without the constant supervision of the University. If acting inappropriately according to town regulations, students should be punished by town enforcement, not by the University.

By having students living in downtown houses, they are helping the local real estate companies survive. They are also aiding the economy of Lewisburg. The students living downtown provide an important link between the University and Lewisburg and by forcing them to move back on campus, town-gown relations will suffer.

Either way, students should continue to maintain the current relationship. The Bucknell Student Government (BSG) recently held a Halloween event in which Lewisburg children could go trick-or-treating at students' houses. This opportunity proved to be an effective way to have the town and University interact.

To increase the effort even further, students should take a proactive role and run for the Ward 3 seat that opened up after Wagner was elected mayor. Last year Nathan Sorber '02 and Matthew Kasdan '03 ran for mayor and Ward 3 representative, respectively.

Although they did not win, their efforts were greatly recognized by both the town and the University. Since then, students have not taken a direct role in Lewisburg community politics. The open Ward 3 seat is the perfect opportunity for students to attempt to gain a presence in local politics.

The candidates in the upcoming BSG election should also dedicate a portion of their campaigns to improving town-gown relations and take a firm stance on whether or not students should have to move back on campus.

After the inauguration of the new BSG president, the governing bodies of both the student body and downtown residents will bring about a brand new administration. With this "clean slate," the potential for improvement (or lack thereof) is endless. The Bucknellian encourages Wagner, the community, the University and BSG to work together to improve upon current relations.

Letters to the editor

Thanks for all the help

To the Editor:

Bling Bling Bison Scarves would like to thank all of the people who donated to our service project. The generosity of the University community was shown through the many donations of office supplies and arts and crafts materials that we received. These donations, and all profits from our business project, went to the Donald L. Heiter Community Center located in downtown Lewisburg. The donations were only part of our company's service project, which included renovating the center's attic and volunteering at the after-school program for a period of two weeks. The project was a major success due to the hard work of our company members and of course, your support. So whether you donated office supplies or simply bought a scarf, we would like to thank you for your help.

Sincerely,
Andrea Paraud '05

Good samaritan saves the day

To the Editor:

Late in the afternoon on Oct. 29, an unexpected snowfall made Route 45 west of Lewisburg quite treacherous. My mother and I found ourselves stuck on the side of the road, in the middle of nowhere, in a snowstorm, in a "no service" area for my cell phone and in a position to make no forward progress. We watched with alarm as cars literally inched up and slid down the hill past us. I silently hoped for a snowplow, salt truck or maybe a lovely wooly Saint Bernard with a small keg of something restorative tied around its neck.

I was frankly amazed when one of the cars that had slid its way past us stopped before completing its descent, and bewildered as the driver made his way over to our car. We opened the window to a young man who offered to help us; who said he'd been on his way to State College and decided to turn back. He identified himself as a student at Bucknell. There wasn't much to be done but perhaps call AAA, which he said he'd do. I was amazed.

A snowplow came along shortly after he left, and we were able to reach AAA to cancel the emergency call. The experience has become just another winter driving episode with one exception—the kindness of the student from Bucknell. I would like to extend our thanks to him once again. His actions that evening exemplified uncommon courtesy.

Sincerely,
Janice Hartman

University study time not enough to prepare

By Andrea Dill
Chief Copy Editor

By the time you realize classes are over, it's as if finals have already begun. The University's daylong reading period is like a drive across Lewisburg—blink and you miss it. About once or twice a year someone creates a fuss about the length of the University's reading period. Trickled down through the levels of administrative bureaucracy to the student level, the debate is put forth as whether or not the University should extend the reading period beyond its current day.

Everyone knows the routine. Classes officially end on a Tuesday, although students and professors alike probably start looking towards break at least a week or two in advance. Wednesday's title changes from "party night" to "dinky reading day." By the early morning hours of Thursday, the portion of campus affected by impending finals is likely in a scholastic tizzy only sustained by a sugar and caffeine high.

An informal study of other schools shows somewhat similar schedules for finals. The University of Southern California and Penn State kids have a weekend. Haverford and American students have two days. Bucknell World names Lehigh and Carnegie Mellon as "comparable" schools, though both schools also provide twice the reading period as the University. Williams gives four days while the Princeton Tigers have about 10 days in which to study for finals. So the question is, does the University hope to align itself with "better" schools by making the transition from a reading day to a reading period?

To test the student waters, occasionally some proactive campus group floats a survey question somewhere along the lines of, "Would you be willing to have a shorter winter break or stay extra days into the summer to extend the reading period?" The overwhelming student response is no. There are many reasons for this result.

Although this is going to come as a shock to professors everywhere, a lot of students probably end up cramming anyway, so having more reading time would only increase the amount of procrastination to epidemic proportions. Secondly, those who did not do the majority of assigned reading during the semester likely have zero intention of fitting it in on a designated Wednesday. To some, extending it to a weeklong reading period might translate to a seven-day vacation instead of extra study time. Moreover, by the end of the semester, almost everybody is itching to get away from Lewisburg in favor of civilization.

The problem is, people at the University are asking the wrong question. This is one of those times when administrators should be earning this year's roughly 8 percent raise in tuition money and making an executive decision. Don't ask students if we want to linger in small-town America when holidays or summer tans are within reach. Don't dangle the option of a reading period because it looks better for the University next to Ivy League admissions pamphlets. Do what is right.

University officials may very well think it is in the best interest of the students to have a few extra days for reading. If that is the case, administrators should extend the reading period. If students replied to the occasional survey question greatly in the affirmative, again, administrators should make a change. Instead, surveys seem to recycle the wrong question that garners predictable results. E-mail surveys often yield few respondents; try another method of information gathering until something legitimate works.

Survey professors, administrators, students, organization leaders and, yes, eventually the student body as a whole. Instead of putting vacation time in peril, ask designated groups, "Do you think students would benefit from an extended reading period? If so, why?" At least with this altered form of the question, students are not blatantly and actively forced to choose between the merits of studying for their liberal arts education and counting the days until they can sleep late and eat home-cooked meals.

Granted, students are probably smart enough to see through the thinly veiled question and notice their breaks are at risk should they answer in the affirmative. The analysis of such response data could be telling nonetheless. Perhaps the University should change the timing of finals so students have a weekend instead of a mid-week read. Perhaps the University should question why other schools have longer reading periods and find out the advantages or drawbacks. There are a lot of possibilities, should the University choose to explore them and report back to campus.

Although I can see both sides, I lean toward extending the reading period. Whether or not most people would use the reading period for its intended purpose, the time would be there for those who were so inclined. In every situation—be it intramural sports, movies or bingo in the Bison—students can opt in or out. The important points are that students have the option of participating and the potential good outweighs the potential harm. For some people, an extra reading day might be a great help. For the rest of the students, it would be more time with their friends. It is the University's job to determine what opportunities should be available for the students. So far, administrators seem convinced that reading period should remain a 24-hour blur.

Opinions

Was Bucknell the right choice?

By Jenny Ross
Senior Writer

I had to have an "I (heart) BU" T-shirt when they first hit the market—or in University terms, the Langone Center Mall. Sure, my friend who is in the management company told me to buy one, but I didn't need her coaxing to convince me to have a shirt that openly showed my love for this institution. I am a walking advertisement for the University. It costs them nothing (I, however, am in the hole over $30,000 a year plus the costs of my Bison apparel), and I'm more than proud to show off my infatuation.

For me, it was love at first sight. The moment you turn off of Route 15 and into the world of the bubble, you can't help but fall in love with the University's architectural beauty. It captures the eye of every prospective student, especially mine.

My first experience with the campus happened to be on a late, rainy summer evening. I was walking through the academic quad while the sun set, an event I now see every day, but back then it was perfect and lured me to come back for a campus tour. The second visit only increased the love I felt.

Finally, as a student, I got to see what went on inside the beauty of the University. I saw the University on rainy, snowy or leaf-covered days and the days when the wind is blowing just right to catch the aroma of manure and have it waft over the campus. I just held my nose and went on smiling at my cookie cutter classmates.

I know everyone thinks that it is tiresome seeing the same person walk by 100 times a day, but coming from a very diverse high school, the cookie-cutter image was better than homemade gingerbread men. I could no longer stick out because I wore Abercrombie, was a good student and played three varsity sports, because everyone else did too. I was put on a level playing field with 3,350 students and had to find out what defined me.

That is why being stuck in this "bubble" is rather beneficial. The small size of the University allows students to become involved with more than one thing. Instead of just being a Division 1 varsity athlete or a sorority sister or newspaper writer, I can become all three.

Had I chosen another school, I would either not be writing this article, not be competing for the softball team or still be an only child and not a sister in a sorority. At the University, I don't have to choose to limit myself—rather I can expand my interests and be a sister, a softball player and a writer.

Choosing this university may have been one of the best decisions I made because of the 3,349 people who made the same decision. I think about all the friends that I have met through being teammates, sisters, hall mates and classmates and I hope that the bond formed in this "bubble" will last years after they drag me out of here kicking and screaming.

Maybe the stench of the nearby cow manure is getting to me, but I think the University is the most magical place on earth. I could be confusing it with Disney World due to the identical lampposts in both downtown Disney and downtown Lewisburg, but I doubt it.

I swore to myself that I would never go to college in Pennsylvania, but love changes everything and my T-shirt doesn't lie ... I love BU!

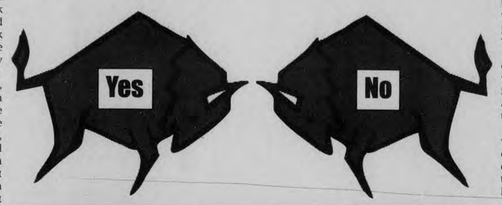
It is often said Bucknellians come from different backgrounds, but all leave on the same well-worn path to success and a life of comfort. What is often left unspoken is what happens in the meantime. There are certain obvious phenomena at the University that we as Bucknellians have come to know as truths.

Truth number one: just in time for Admissions Weekend the lawns turn curiously lush and verdant (it's not pixie dust, it's a caustic concoction of chemicals).

Truth number two: at some point in time (and that time is now) you will realize that the Rooke Chapel bells are not actually bells, but speakers sounding their pre-programmed, quarter-hourly peal.

Truth number three: every weekend herds of Bucknellians flock to Sixth Street to pursue meaningful (albeit sometimes short-term) relationships in the milieu of a dank and poorly lit basement with the faint aroma of stale beer and vomit.

Truth number four: recurring and familiar faces of minority students make their way into diversity-related literature at the University, and you would see their bodies walking around campus if they hadn't graduated three years ago.



Truth number five: the dynamics of popular clothing-wearing culture at the University is subject to seasonal and yearly adjustment as dictated in part by the Abercrombie catalog.

But I really have no problem with these things. I do find the compulsion for many students to dress alike a peculiar and sometimes entertaining occurrence, but I know that Bucknellians are not all homogonously upper-middle class or snobbish, and that there are myriads of interesting and kind and thoughtful students at the University, students who pay their own tuition (like myself), and students who are absolutely unique and expressive—many of whom are also Greek or are even management majors. I am forever thankful to know a great many of these people, just as I am forever thankful for the inspiring professors and excellent academics that have forbade me from transferring.

So why do I regret coming to the University?

When so-called "leaders" are spread so thin that the president of Friends of Lesbians, Gays, Bisexuals and Transgendered (FLAG&BT) works with the president of V-Day Bucknell, who works with "The Catalyst" to advocate some hint of progressive change on a starkly apathetic campus, there is a problem.

When within the first few weeks a student soberly realizes (after numerous scornful and derisive remarks) that it is just socially unacceptable to wear her favorite blue, hooded sweatshirt, despite the fact that she finds it warm and comfortable, there is a problem.

When a person's mental health suffers to a breaking point as a consequence of the simple (and perhaps unintended) actions and attitudes of fellow students, there is a problem!

This detached air of superiority so prevalent and so characteristic of the culture of this campus is nauseating and suffocating—and this feeling is not fictitious or misdirected, nor am I alone in feeling this way.

Think about it. Just because people cannot afford to wear J. Crew or Abercrombie does not mean that they are less cultured or less intelligent. Or just because people choose not to define their identities by the clothes they wear or the cars they drive does not mean that they cannot afford to purchase such things.

But I have learned a few important lessons in three years here: the first is to stand up for social justice issues that don't necessarily affect me directly; the second is that under the University's deceptively attractive veneer grinds the machinations of a vastly image conscious culture and a corporate administration. As a slightly jaded person who cares little about image, coming to this university was probably one of the worst decisions I've made.

America's greatest threat

By Tim Hinkle
Staff Writer

Start digging your bomb shelter and start stock piling SPAM, because the greatest of many grave threats to American liberty was made known on Monday.

You might be surprised to hear that the origin of this hidden danger is not some grand terrorist conspiracy hatched by the evil Osama bin Laden. Not even Iraqi President Saddam Hussein could have hatched a plot so ingeniously designed to end our way of life. No, the only people with the motivation and means to bring about this assault on America are those who we would least suspect—our very own federal government.

The Bush administration is furiously trying to force a new Homeland Security Bill through the Senate after it passed the House last week. This new 500-page bill, which none if any of our senators have read completely or have even decently understood, contains many new riders and assaults on the privacy and civil liberties of every American. One of the many disturbing pieces of legislation hiding in the new Homeland Security Bill is the allocation of $200 million in funding for a program called "Total Information Awareness," to be spearheaded by the Department of Defense.

This program, according to conservative New York Times columnist William Safire, will allow the government to keep comprehensive and detailed computerized records of "every purchase you make with a credit card, every magazine subscription you buy and medical prescription you fill, every Web site you visit and e-mail you send or receive, every academic grade you receive, every bank deposit you make, every trip you book and every event you attend."

Who is to head this project, you ask? None other than National Security Adviser John Poindexter, the man who was convicted during the Iran Contra affair of selling missiles to axis-of-evil member Iran in order to finance illicit CIA activities in Nicaragua.

Poindexter has shown his willingness to deceive the American public in the past and clearly this trend has not ended. What is most disturbing is that Poindexter would be directed to gather information on every single American, regardless of whether criminal or terrorist involvement is suspected. That's right, our government is going to start keeping detailed and comprehensive records of almost everything you do.

The Bush administration has made it a priority to systematically dismantle the freedoms that make America the great place it is. The hastily passed Patriot Act of 2002 allows Attorney General John Ashcroft to suspend the Fourth Amendment rights, the right which protects any U.S. citizen from unreasonable search and seizure, so long as it is deemed in the interests of national security.

Agents of the government are allowed under the Patriot Act to enter your home without your consent or reasonable suspicion, seize your property and leave without ever informing you—you would think that you were robbed, but in fact it was done legally by a government agent.

The year 1984 has come and gone, but if all this is beginning to sound starkly Orwellian, that only means that you are paying attention. America is beginning a disturbing slide away from democracy toward a true fascist state. The Bush administration is shamelessly using the deaths of 3,000 Americans on Sept. 11 to ruthlessly deprive us of our essential inalienable freedoms.

So to all who are reading, I say wake up and break the trance. We cannot allow these violations of our most precious liberties to go unchallenged.

If you truly value what it means to be an American, you must stand up and do everything in your power to oppose this new Homeland Security Bill. Contact your senator and voice your dissent before it is too late and you wake up living in a police state that only vaguely resembles the America that we are so lucky to have inherited.

Looking back in anger at Afghanistan

By Michael Niebauer
Senior Writer

As Thanksgiving approaches, here are a few suggestions for keeping the dinner table conversation lively before dessert is served. After the Republican win in this year's election most pundits were saying that it really was an affirmation of the Bush administration's "war policies." If true, perhaps we should look toward the back pages of newspapers for the effects of the "voter approved" Bush Doctrine on the United States and our allies in the Afghanistan campaign. This is where the turkey begins to churn or blind unquestioning patriotism takes over on Turkey Day.

The geographic diversity of these articles ranges from central Illinois to Washington D.C., to our Canadian neighbors to Bagram in Afghanistan, but the stench is coming from our methods of operation in the war on terror ... so far. This is an important exercise as the United States plans to project power through the Bush Doctrine of "pre-emptive political politics" in Iraq and into the future. The future apparently requires a strong stomach and copious amounts of morally ambiguous flexibility, if the last year in Afghanistan is any indication.

So, after a year how are things in Afghanistan? Have we won in the hearts and minds of the people of that war torn land?

In Sherman, Ill., Veterans of Foreign Wars posts are collecting money in drop jars for the legal defense fund of American pilots. The need arises from a "friendly fire" incident last spring (April 17) in which U.S. pilots in Afghanistan bombed and killed four Canadian troops during a training exercise. Two of the pilots are local residents and communities across central Illinois are collecting funds for the suit brought against them by a U.S. military court. Majors Schmitt and Umbach are charged with poor airman-ship and judgement in the incident. Pilots Schmitt and Umbach can receive sentences of 64 years in prison and dishonorable discharge for their roles in this incident. Even the families of the Canadian soldiers are surprised at the severity of the punishment in these cases.

Local residents are angered because of the perception that the U.S. military is coming down hard on the pilots to appease the Canadian allies in the war on terror. Many locals have become involved in aiding in financial defense of the pilots so from the local Subway restaurant to local golf tournaments are raising legal defense funds ($200,000 so far) for the pilots. As in the past, the frontline soldier is taking the heat for battlefield mistakes to save those policy initiatives that are deemed more important than individual careers. What are we to think of this type of political scapegoating of pilots in a country that advertises for military recruitment with online video games and slick television commercials stressing "money for college" to money-strapped prospective students? The fact that this story is buried deep on page 10 of USA Today and is under-reported on radio and television shamefully speaks volumes.

Col. David Hackworth's newspaper commentary of Nov. 15 states that during last March in Afghanistan, our troops in Operation Anaconda were not adequately trained for mountain fighting. Hackworth continues by vilifying our intelligence (CIA) operatives in Afghanistan for getting our troops "initially clobbered" by al-Qaida fighters because the "fancy" intelligence gear wasn't up to the task. Also, that in many cases they were outgunned because the Taliban soldiers had superior small arms and "outshot our soldiers" in the high altitude of the mountains.

This Thanksgiving give thanks for home, family and friends. Also hope for the personal resolve to read and require more from our mainstream media outlets than jingoism and patriotic platitudes. Afterwards, while you are reading past page 10, look at what is buried deep between the lines for the truth—democracy requires it. Just the good and especially the bad facts media people ... please.

Hackworth expresses the view that our out-of-breath troops in the high altitudes were saved only by our air superiority. Hackworth, a highly decorated soldier in Vietnam expressed his disgust when he said, "the Army brass submitted their reports by stating, 'We Won!' covered up the untidy facts and rushed home to present hundreds of medals as part of their cover-your-behind" campaign. How can we trust our intelligence if the facts are covered up by those we are told to trust? Payoffs, coverups and deception are not exactly the ingredients of any sustainable policy anywhere doing anything. Is this what we voted so much in favor of on Election Day? Are we really ready for this new U.S. role of paternalistic world policeman?

So, after a year how are things in Afghanistan? Have we won the hearts and minds of the people of that war torn land? In a Tom Squitieri (Associated Press) article, doubt abounds. Most Afghans feel less safe in a deteriorating and more dangerous situation than a year ago. The U.S.-backed government of Hamid Karsai is unstable and in control of little outside of the capital, Kabul. Dissent is rising within the government, with assassinations a fact of life for all officials in the government. Our paid-for friends the warlords control the rest of the landscape and rivals have already begun jockeying for power among themselves.

Extremists outside of the well-protected capital wait in the mountains for any sign of a lack of support or resolve of any faction involved. The Taliban and al-Qaida forces are fewer in number but not in the intensity of their resolve and religious beliefs, and these are still operational in many areas. U.S. troops on patrol in search of terrorists in eastern Afghanistan daily face hostility and attacks on their positions. Winning a long-term peace after a perceived quick win in a short and victorious war seems to be dimming in Afghanistan.

This Thanksgiving give thanks for home, family and friends. Also hope for the personal resolve to read and require more from our mainstream media outlets than jingoism and patriotic platitudes. Afterwards, while you are reading past page 10, look at what is buried deep between the lines for the truth—democracy requires it. Just the good and especially the bad facts media people ... please. Hopefully next year at Thanksgiving we won't have to look back in anger or disgust at our role in Iraq.

Happy Thanksgiving ... really.

La Primavera—stick to Italian entrées

By Alyson Walker
Features Editor

La Primavera, located on Route 45, gets mixed reviews from the collegiate crowd.

I went on a Friday night and, luckily, my party had called ahead for a table for five. Otherwise, we would have waited, most likely for 10-15 minutes. The restaurant was fairly crowded, and the atmosphere was of a slightly dressier nature than I had envisioned. No tacky placemats for La Primavera—instead, think cloth napkins and an indoor fountain.

Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

Service was slow that evening, and it was awhile before we were even asked what we wanted to drink. So long that we placed drink orders with our appetizer and meals. Luckily, we were given bruschetta to munch on while we were seated.

For an appetizer, we split a shrimp cocktail, which was served with horseradish sauce and saltine crackers. We were puzzled by the individually wrapped crackers but figured that it was some unfamiliar feature of classy dining that we had forgotten due to eating too often at the cafeteria.

Our dinners came with salads and fresh bread. The salads had a nice mix of fresh greens and sparse vegetables, but watch out for olives with pits! The bread was delicious and came to our table still warm.

The entrées were both aesthetic and appetizing. My shrimp scampi had great flavor, although there was a bit of excess sauce causing some messiness. The portions were average to large—you definitely won't leave hungry.

The steak was not as appetizing as the more Italian entrées. It was likened to a flat hamburger. Ketchup was requested to add flavor and compensate for its tough texture. Although it was ordered medium rare, it arrived more well-done, with no pink at all. It was served with baked potato, broccoli and a bowl of spaghetti.

Certain classic entrées were offered with salad and bread for only $8.95, including spaghetti and meatballs, stuffed shells, manicotti and ravioli. La Primavera also serves different gourmet pizzas.

Other entrées included a variety of chicken, beef, seafood and vegetarian dishes. The fettuccini alfredo was made with a rich creamy sauce and was deemed delicious. Chicken and vegetables with pasta was also enjoyable.

Although our service was a bit slow, it was a busy Friday night. Keeping that in mind, we did not wait that long for our entrées. Perhaps it was the aroma of fresh bread and marinara sauce that had us anxiously awaiting our food.

Many University students have had good experiences at La Primavera.

"I thought La Primavera rocked," Eric Bundy '05 said. "Everything was perfect. There was relaxation in the atmosphere from walking in until walking out, and the service and food made that dinner one of the most enjoyable evenings I've ever had."

The price is affordable for a student budget. Most entrées range in price from $9 to $16.

"La Primavera has fairly priced tasty Italian cuisine that offers an alternative to the usual restaurants in town," Lauren Scott '04 said.

Other University students concur with Bundy and Scott.

"The food there is great, and it's even better because it's authentic. You never leave the place hungry," Grace Annis '03 said.

Overall, our visit to La Primavera was enjoyable. Just remember to make a reservation for crowded evenings and block in a little extra time for service. We'll give it another chance.

The overall good food mixed with a touch of atmosphere made for an enjoyable evening. After all, one steak shouldn't ruin the herd—or the Italian cuisine.

La Primavera, at an affordable price, offers good food with a classy atmosphere—fountains and all. Although, be advised to make a reservation before you go.

'Tis the season to be giving

Volunteer opportunities with both the Giving Tree and the Literacy Tree projects

By Ashley Maliken
Staff Writer

They say that Christmas is the season of giving, and for students and faculty at the University the opportunities to do so are around every corner. This year, two of the biggest volunteer projects are the Giving Tree, being run by Assistant Dean of Students Amy Badal and Coordinator of Volunteer Activities Tina McDowell, and the Literacy Tree, sponsored by the Bookstore and coordinated by employee Kendy Alvarez. Through both projects, individuals are offered the opportunity to brighten the holiday season for underprivileged men, women and children throughout the Lewisburg community and surrounding areas.

The Giving Tree, which encourages you to "take a flake," is located on the bottom floor of the LC. Any passer-by is welcomed to select a flake from the tree and buy a holiday gift for local children, senior citizens and other needy community members. Once a flake is selected, with a gift usually ranging from $15-$25, it must be signed out, purchased, wrapped and delivered to LC 211 before 4:30 p.m. on Dec. 5. The gifts will then be delivered to their various recipients on Dec. 14, helping to bring gifts to many who otherwise would not have them. Cash donations are also accepted and will be used to purchase other gifts for needy families.

"We have 100 more families than last year. [Gifts] are as simple as a coloring book to a sweatshirt for an elderly person," Badal said.

Participating organizations include the Red Cross, Salvation Army, local nursing homes, children's organizations and YMCAs. All of the 600 or more recipients hanging from the tree are guaranteed to receive the gift they've requested, and oftentimes much more.

"We make sure that every request is filled; nobody goes without. Yet [the University] faculty, students and administrators have a way of going above and beyond," McDowell said.

The fourth Annual Literacy Tree, located in the front of the Bookstore, holds the names of over 300 preschoolers from the 12 area Head Start Classes. Head Start, a nationwide organization, has been helping to increase the school readiness of young children from low-income families since 1965.

Each star represents a 3-to-5-year-old child, and staff and students are invited to become "book angels" and purchase the book written on the star. Once you've selected a star, it is replaced by an angel named after you. The first year the program was implemented, in 1999, it proved successful with 130 books being donated to three centers. Since then the program has grown tremendously.

"Due to the generosity of [the University], last year we were able to provide books for the area Head Start Centers with a total of 331 children. This year we have an even more ambitious goal of 381 books and are hoping for as much support from the campus community as before," Alvarez said.

Books can be purchased through Dec. 13 and will be delivered before the Head Start schools begin their holiday break. It is not required that books be purchased at the University Bookstore, but a wide selection of titles in a range of prices are available and wrapping is provided for all gift donations. Monetary donations are also welcomed, and will be put toward the purchase of more books.

Throughout the holiday season other volunteer opportunities will arise both here at the University and in the Lewisburg area. So keep your eyes and ears to the ground, and be willing to open your hearts (and possibly your wallets) to help make this year a better one for someone who certainly deserves your kindness.

Teaching lessons 'round the world—from Romania to Lewisburg

By Rachel Gold
Senior Writer

Traveling to and from Romania every few years, Professor of Mechanical Engineering Stoian Petrescu has improved his style of teaching and worked to perfect his practice based on which method works best.

After graduating from the University Polytechnica Bucharest in 1961, Petrescu became an assistant professor in the engineering thermodynamics department and part of the mechanical engineering faculty. A professor and dean at the same university, Petrescu's father advised him to take a similar path. Petrescu spent 30 years teaching in Romania where he was named head of the department of engineering thermodynamics and the thermal machines department.

"The methods of teaching are quite different between the Romanian University and Bucknell. I have had a chance to compare the two and use the best methods from each situation," Petrescu said.

According to Petrescu, the University's mechanical engineers are given a lot of homework assignments, whereas in Romania there are few in comparison. Within the last 10 years Petrescu has taught at many universities and learned a lot from each experience.

He taught at Duke University for two years, in Romania for six months and then came to Bucknell, where he taught from 1993 to 1998. After venturing back to Romania for three years, where he taught at the University Polytechnica Bucharest, Petrescu has once again returned to the United States to teach at the University.

"I love this guy!" Justin Schwartz '04 said. "Professor Petrescu truly loves what he teaches and cares about his students. He teaches his class work in a fun and interesting manner that makes you not just have to learn the material, but want to."

Petrescu believes that the University's style of learning is far more beneficial to students than the Romanian style. He feels that because there are many homework assignments for University students and hardly any for students in Romania, there is far less pressure on students here to perform well on the final exam. In Romania there are no partial exams.

"At Bucknell the mechanical engineering students are given three exams a semester, whereas in Romania the students have only one final exam and their entire grade is dependent upon their score," Petrescu said. "Here there are a lot more factors and assignments that help determine their final grade. Students are given many homework assignments, quizzes, laboratory reports and research reports."

> "The students in Romania would never interrupt the professor during his lecture. Here students are encouraged to interact with the professor and this interaction is extremely important."
> —Stoian Petrescu, professor of mechanical engineering

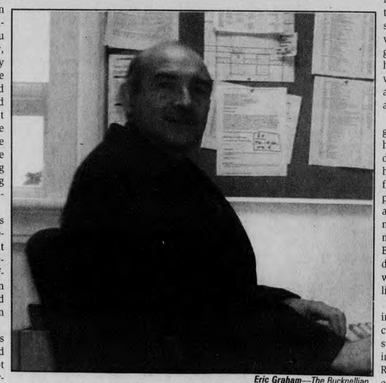
Although Petrescu said that both Romanian and University students attend classes regularly and take notes, "here students learn primarily in the time of the semester and in Romania the students learn mostly in the time of the exam session."

"I really enjoy Professor Petrescu's teaching style," Christian Decker '04 said. "He makes the material fun to learn and easy to understand."

Understanding students' needs and the conditions in which they perform their best, Petrescu has tried to alter the Romanian educational system and adopt some of the techniques he has used in the States.

"I have tried, in Romania, to give my students seven homework assignments a semester in comparison to the approximately 20 homework assignments students get here. At first the Romanian students' reaction was quite negative," Petrescu said. "However, after awhile they began to like the 'new idea' and accommodated because it decreased the effort and time they would have to put in during the month-long final exam session."



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Professor Stoian Petrescu compares teaching in Romania with teaching at Bucknell. He is known to make original analogies for thermodynamics, such as the relationship between a Swedish miller and an astronaut.

Smaller class size and the frequent student teacher interaction is a major difference between the University and the university in Romania.

"The students in Romania would never interrupt the professor during his lecture. Here students are encouraged to interact with the professor and this interaction is extremely important. The students are advised to ask questions," Petrescu said. "In turn, my lectures become more alive and their participation makes for a more interesting and active learning experience."

Both arts and sciences students and engineers at the University develop close relationships with their professors. Petrescu identifies the interaction he has with his students in and outside of the classroom as one of the most rewarding aspects of his job. According to Petrescu, in Romania, the classes have over 100 students and the interaction between the students and professors is minimal even with an effort on both parts. As a result, Romanian students are "forced" to grasp almost all of the semester's material in a very short span of time.

"Here I can discover what kinds of problems my students are having with the various concepts and techniques of computation; therefore, my students have a better chance of understanding the material because they have cleared up their concerns before the exam," Petrescu said.

Mike DeVita '04 shared this sentiment.

"I never knew this guy until this year, and now he is my energy conversion friend," DeVita said. "We share our passion for building a Carnot engine, and he said himself, 'you never know, my friend, the DeVita engine can be the first Carnot engine.'"

In Romania, since the time spent with students is far less than at the University, Petrescu had more time to conduct his research. Although Petrescu enjoys that the teaching load is smaller and that he is able to spend more time with his team and graduate students, he feels that the working conditions at the University are excellent.

"I love the great interaction I have with my students. The people here are very friendly and supportive. I am always learning new things from my students. Bucknell is a wonderful place to work and enjoy life," Petrescu said.

When he is not in the classroom, conversing with his students, researching or traveling to Romania, Petrescu enjoys playing the piano, accordion, violin and mandolin.

"My mother was a music professor so she taught me how to enjoy music," Petrescu said.

Within the last 10 years he has had the opportunity to travel all over the United States and enjoy experiencing all of the wonderful places he has seen.

"Professor Petrescu always keeps us entertained," Christine Keenan '04 said. "He makes analogies of thermodynamic ideas that I never would have thought of on my own. Being in his class will make me 'wus.'"

Bison clinch 3rd place in Patriot League

With a 3-0 victory over Colgate, the Bison head to the Patriot League playoffs for the 8th time in the past nine years

By Brent Butler
Sports Editor

With a 3-0 victory over the Colgate Raiders last Saturday the Bucknell volleyball team has captured the 3rd-place seed in the Patriot League Tournament. The Bison have 15-12 overall record and a 9-5 Patriot League record.

Prior to the Colgate game the Bison celebrated the careers of two of its seniors, Melanie Ghiz and Jennifer Wrigley. Ghiz and Wrigley have been vital parts of the team's success the past four years.

"It was our senior night, and it was the last time we would all play together as a team in our own gym, Chelsea Anderson '06 said. "We knew that Colgate was going to come out strong because they had noting to lose."

The Bison finished off their final Patriot League game of the season with an impressive 3-0 victory over Colgate. In the first two games of the night, the Orange and Blue beat the Raiders 30-28 and 30-28. Both games were close, but after the intermission the Bison pulled ahead with a 10-point lead in the first 15 points and didn't look back, finally winning the third game 30-23.

"We had to win to keep our seed in the tournament, so we had to go out and play our game," Anderson said. "They definitely gave us a close game, but i think that we had the fire and intensity to bring us the win."

Ghiz recorded a team-high 13 kills and had a team-high .370 hitting average. Wrigley added 11 digs to the Bison effort, while Courtney Clark '06 tallied 10 kills and had an impressive .368 hitting percentage, while Breean Trapasso '04 also added 31 assists and a team high 12 digs on the night. Brandi Trapasso '04 added 10 digs to help the Bison finish off the Raiders.

With the victory, Bucknell has clinched the No. 3 seed in the Patriot League Tournament and will play second-seeded Lehigh on Friday in Washington, D.C. This year will be the 8th time in the past nine years that Head Coach Cindy Opalski has escorted the Bison to the Patriot League playoffs.

On Wednesday Ghiz and Brandi Trapasso were named to the All-Patriot League volleyball team.

Ghiz has led the Bison this year with 396 kills out of a total 555 total career kills and a .253 hitting average. Throughout the 2002 campaign. Ghiz averages 4.24 kills per game, and 0.65 service aces per game average, and she is among the League leaders in a number of categories.

Brandi Trapasso leads the League and is 17th in NCAA stats in digs per game with a 4.50 average. She is also ninth in the Patriot League in kills with a 3.05 kills per game. Brandi Trapasso has added 305 kills to the Bison effort this year.

On Thursday, Nov. 14, Breean Trapasso was named to the 2002 Verizon Academic All-District II second-team. Breean Trapasso has been a vital part of the team contributing 1,075 assists throughout the season. Breean Trapasso has become an all-around student-athlete in her years at Bucknell. She completed the 2001-02 school year with a 3.97 cumulative grade point average, and has made the dean's list many times during her first two years at Bucknell. She has received the President's Award for Academic Excellence and the Charles F.

Bison continue to struggle

By Cory Nadler
Senior Writer

The Bucknell offense continued to sputter, as the 23rd-ranked Lehigh Mountain Hawks proved to be too much for the Bison defense to handle on a very wet and muddy afternoon last Saturday in Bethlehem, Pa. The Bison could only muster 134 offensive yards in the 24-0 loss, as Bucknell dropped to 2-8 on the season and 0-6 in the Patriot League.

From the onset this game looked as though it was going to be a defensive struggle, as many of Bucknell's games have been so far this season. After trading punts for much of the first quarter, the Bison needed a spark and attempted a fake punt from their own 38-yard line. Following the failed fake punt attempt, the Mountain Hawks took advantage of the good field position by running the ball in from 18 yards out three plays later. The score was 7-0 Lehigh after the first play of the second quarter, and the Mountain Hawks would not need any more points to put a mark in the win column.

On the ensuing Bison possession, Daris Wilson '05, who is normally a wide receiver for the Bison but started and played most of the game at quarterback following a solid outing the week before, threw his first of two interceptions on the day. The Mountain Hawks took over the ball at their own 43-yard line, and marched methodically down the field. Lehigh capped off the scoring drive 12 plays and 45 yards later with a 29-yard field goal to make the score 10-0 with 5 minutes, 51 seconds remaining in the first half.

Cross country makes a strong showing

By Evan Honeyfield
Staff Writer

The men's and women's cross country teams made strong showings this past weekend at the Mid-Atlantic Regional meet held at Canaan Valley State Park in West Virginia. The women continued to improve and finished an impressive 6th place while the men rebounded from two sub-par performances to finish 10th.

Going into the meet, the Bison women were ranked 8th in the region. A number of strong performances and seasonal best allowed the women to climb the rankings. Although Theresa Dennis '03 didn't qualify for the national meet like last year, she ran a strong race to lead the lady Bison to their best race of the season with her 21st place finish. The Bison also had impressive performances from Jamie Gow '06 (37th), Niki Piper '03 (40th), Kayla Halloran '06 (44th) and Alison Cole '06 (49th).

Since the women's team lost three of the top four runners from last season due to graduation, the lady Bison were not expected to finish this high. Hard work has pulled the team towards the top.

Filling more than shoes: the legacy of Head Coach Tom Gadd

By Brian Klotz
Senior Writer

From the beginning of the fall season until the end, the Bucknell football program has been through some tumultuous times. The heart and soul of the Bucknell football program, Head Coach Tom Gadd, had to leave the reins of the team this past August to continue his fight with cancer.

To the players, especially those under his coaching for four years, it was an upsetting time.

"It hurt us a lot," Luman Bauta '03 said. "It's like missing the general in a war. He did everything for us."

Doing everything for the Bucknell football program is no understatement. In the seven years Gadd has been head coach (1995-2001), the program has experienced an evolution. He led the team to winning seasons in all of his seven years and accumulated 48 total wins, making him one of the most successful coaches in Bucknell's 117-year football history. Some, like Director of Athletics and Recreation John Hardt, feel that this is because of Gadd's competitiveness.

"If I had to select just one quality that I admire in Tom above all others, it would be his competitive spirit," he said. "I don't believe that Tom Gadd has ever backed away from a challenge, and his competitive desire is a primary force in the Bison football program."

To the players, motivation and respect were key ingredients to Gadd's coaching strength.

"When he first came to visit me when I was being recruited, I respected every ounce of him," Todd Warmington '03 said. "He just has a presence. I think that a lot of the close games that we lost this year we might have won because of his leadership and his ability to get the most out of every single player."

Gadd has been involved in coaching football since 1969 when he got his start at his alma mater, the University of California-Riverside. In the nearly 30 years following, he switched jobs many times before finally coming to the University in 1995. His area of expertise was defensive coordinator, and he coached at such places as Long Beach State, San Jose State, the universities of Utah, South Carolina and Minnesota. One especially impressive achievement was his role on the 1984 South Carolina team that finished with a 10-1 record and would have played for the national championship, if not for a late-season loss. Gadd's style of defensive there even coined the nickname "Fire Ants" because of the players' ability to swarm to the ball coupled with the red color of their uniforms.

When Gadd came to Bucknell to assume the role of head coach, he faced a tremendous challenge. He found himself becoming a part of a school that had only one winning football season in the last 14 and whose community had no pride in its program. He turned that around in a hurry. After his first season, the Bison finished at 7-4, and his very next season, 1996, the team became Patriot League champions for the first time in nearly 30 years. The final game of the 1996 season came to epitomize Gadd's style of coaching. In a 28-27 overtime win over Colgate, the team's mental toughness, which Gadd stresses in his players, was the deciding factor.

Gadd also made it his mission to restore a sense of pride in Bucknell football through bringing alumni back.

"Coach Gadd has personally contacted (or attempted to contact) every living football letterman at Bucknell, and launched the very popular Bud Ranck Memorial Golf Outing, which annually draws over 300 alums back to campus in support of the Bison football program," Hardt said. "In this regard, the Bucknell football program has never had a better goodwill ambassador than Tom Gadd."

It was just two short years ago that the Bucknell athletics community was rocked by news of Gadd's unexpected health condition. While on a Christmas vacation visiting some friends, he had a seizure, and after hospital tests, it was determined that the cause was a brain tumor. After two operations, he continues to fight the disease, and coached through the summer 2002 months before the tumor, which affects his short-term memory and ability to do physical work, took him off the field.

Even so, Gadd's commitment to Bucknell football is still evident.

"Even now, when I went to see him in the hospital, he still knows what's going on and we talk football," Gary Carruthers '03 said. "He only accepted the best from his players and was the type of guy you wanted to work hard for."

Acting Head Coach Dave Kotulski coached with Gadd for nearly seven years prior to coming to the University and feels that he contributes more than just leadership.

"I think the biggest thing is that he really cares about the people," Kotulski said. "One of his mottos was, 'Do what's right' whether on the field, in the classroom or in life. He was consumed with being the best he could be and making the program the best it could be."

Throughout his seven-year tenure, Gadd has brought success, earned the respect of many and made many lasting impressions on his athletes. Eric Storm '03 related this fact.

"His personal interest in every single player showed how much he cared about the team," Storm said. "I remember when I first met him when he came to see me before I decided to come play for Bucknell. He said, 'I promise I will watch you graduate, and last year when I was at graduation, he was there in a wheelchair, watching his guys graduate."

These copies of The Daily Item printed in 1997, chronicled Gadd's best season with the Bison. The 1997 season also happened to be the best season in Bucknell football history, with its first 10-win season.

Gadd's legacy will endure

The effects of cancer spread in two ways—through the body of the person it affects, and at the same time, through the community affected by the person. Through Head Football Coach Tom Gadd, it is easy to see that the disease is not only an individual battle; when Gadd found out he had cancer, the entire football team was diagnosed.

In the winter of 1994, Gadd took over a Bison squad that had only one winning campaign in its previous 14 seasons. With an attitude stressing the importance of persistence, hard work and dedication, by 1996, he turned the team around to win its first conference championship in over 30 years.

Gadd's accomplishments continued to build as he constantly reached never-before seen landmarks. He led the program to its first-ever 10-win season in 1997 and tied the school record with 48 coaching wins.

For the first time in Bucknell's 116-year history, Gadd had accumulated seven straight winning seasons.

His impact on the Bucknell football community was recognized when he was named American Football Quarterly's 1997 Newcomer of the Year for Division 1-AA along with Patriot League Coach of the Year. He also received the prestigious honor of being one of 10 finalists for the Eddie Robinson Award, which recognized his accomplishments on a national level.

Unfortunately, in the summer of 2001, Gadd was diagnosed with cancer and its weakening effects caused him to step down from the position of head coach at the beginning of the 2002 season. Now, Gadds previous accomplishments and impact on the football community seem to be highlighted even more through his absence.

"Coach Gadd pretty much turned around the program for us," Todd Wenrich '03 said. "Not having him out on the field is a big deal. All the guys respected him; when he walked out in front of you, your attention would go right to him."

Gadd did not ask for respect—it was simply understood. Gadd's guidance and leadership on and off the field was a key aspect that many athletes admired.

"He has a presence about him that was more of a leadership role than anything," Billy Windle '03 said. "You always knew he was gonna be there. In football that's big. That's one of the biggest parts of the program he helped with."

The team seems most thankful that the acting Head Coach Dave Kotulski is keeping with the same structure, traditions and beliefs that Gadd had instilled in the program from the very beginning. It has helped them adjust to Gadd's absence by reminding them that though he isn't able to be there in person, a part of him is still with them on the field.

"The head coach now has the same mentality as Coach Gadd," Wenrich said. "He knows what we've been doing the past couple years and kept a lot of the traditions alive."

As a coach who served as both a leader and mentor for most of his athletes' entire college football careers, it is difficult for them not to take constant notice of his absence.

"It's similar to a boss," Dave Gibson '04 said. "If the boss isn't there things still go well, but not as well if he were around. There's definitely something missing."

Gadd has left a mark too powerful to be forgotten. He left his skills in the record books, his morals in his athletes and his traditions in the program. Even though Gadd is no longer on the field with the Bison, his presence is still felt.

Champion in a box

Achieving athletic excellence has many advantages. Win a Super Bowl, a World Series or an Olympic gold medal, and within a week your hometown will throw a parade for you, there will be a billboard hovering over I-95 with your smiling face plastered across it and a Sports Illustrated cover will be waiting for you.

A spot on Jay Leno's couch will open up for you, you'll be asked to do cameos on a few sitcoms that you've probably never even lowered yourself to watch and someone on "Saturday Night Live" will mercilessly deride you. You might even be immortalized in the form of a bobblehead, which will inevitably bear just enough resemblance to you to give you and your loved ones the creeps.

Even though massive spring-loaded plastic heads mounted on incongruously small bodies have a certain allure about them, there is one tradition of athlete exaltation that exceeds all other endorsements and deification. Simply put, there's nothing quite like seeing your image superimposed on a blindingly vibrant orange cardboard box, staring down at you from the top shelf in aisle 12 of Acme Supermarket, sandwiched between Tony the Tiger and Count Chocula.

Appearances on the Wheaties box have been among the boasting rights of some of history's greatest athletes—Lou Gehrig, Walter Payton, Cal Ripken Jr., Johnny Weismuller and Michael Jordon, to name a few. People have been dreaming of endorsing the ageless bran flakes for decades.

Like some of the athletes it relied on for endorsement, the now-familiar Wheaties bran flakes arose from humble beginnings. As it happened, their "discovery" was actually a mistake—if it weren't for a sloppy health clinician in 1921, the world of cereal might never have provided anything more inspiring than Toucan Sam.

The worker was preparing a scrumptious feast of wheat gruel for patients at a Minneapolis health clinic when he slopped some of the mixture onto the burner. The "sludge of champions" sizzled and spat and solidified itself into a crispy little flake, which the cook felt compelled to sample. It turned out to be a delicious—and nutritious—mistake.

The burned-up bran was eventually brought to the attention of George Cormack, the head miller at the Washburn Crosby Company (which eventually became General Mills), who toiled away at designing the perfect bran flake. In 1924 he unveiled Washburn's Gold Medal Whole Wheat Flakes. Realizing the name was longer than the average consumer's attention span, the company held an employee contest to choose a new name. The winner was Jane Bausman, the wife of a company executive, and the product was christened as "Wheaties."

Wheaties didn't become a part of sports culture until 1933, when the cereal launched a sponsorship of minor-league baseball radio broadcasts. One of the radio stations gave the company the opportunity to advertise Wheaties on a big signboard with its slogan of choice. The bran gurus then turned to advertising expert Knox Reeves, who reeled off a quick sketch of the box design, complete with a new slogan that would soon become engrained in pop culture—"Wheaties: the breakfast of champions."

To gain the affection of active Americans everywhere, Wheaties placed its breakfast of champions in the hands—or mouths, rather—of the champions themselves. Gehrig became the first athlete to endorse Wheaties, appearing on the back of the box in 1934. A staggering line of sports heroes swore by the crunchy breakfast during the decade that ensued, including Joe DiMaggio, Ben Hogan, Bronko Nagurski, Ted Williams and Warren Spahn.

It wasn't until 1958 that the Wheaties endorsement really became the ultimate exploitative honor for athletes. After a brief fling with the Lone Ranger and other non-sports icons, Wheaties turned to Olympic gold medal-winning pole vaulter Bob Richards as the product spokesman and inked his likeness on the front of the box.

Richards was the first to appear on the front of the package, and was followed by seven other spokespeople honored by the company since the 1950s. Bruce Jenner, Mary Lou Retton, Pete Rose, Walter Payton, Chris Evert, Jordon and Tiger Woods all contributed to the tradition as the years rolled on.

While only eight athletes have been named spokespeople, the list of those who have been immortalized on a cardboard sea of orange and white is almost incalculable. Men and women from a diverse variety of sports have taken a bow beneath the big white block letters, including heroes from baseball, football, track and field, gymnastics, diving and women's ice hockey. A few athletes have made multiple appearances, but Wheaties' most frequent flier was, not surprisingly, Jordon, who showed up on the box 18 times.

The meteoric rise of Wheaties still hasn't showed any signs of halting in recent years; it's even evolved into a couple of sub-species in Honey Frosted Wheaties and the sugary bombardment of carbohydrates known at Wheaties Energy Crunch. Competing athlete-endorsed cereals have sprouted up in groceries all over the nation, and a few—most notably, Flutie Flakes—have garnered tremendous popularity. But there's nothing quite like the original, with its vertiginous orange complexion, its sporty white logo and its confidence-inspiring slogan.

For more than half a century, starry-eyed athletes have pictured themselves on the Wheaties box, and it's likely that they'll continue to do so. Over the past 81 years, Wheaties have become an enigmatically popular piece of marketing history, a subject of intense interest in the world of sports memorabilia and, most importantly, a lasting facet of the American sports dream.

That's a heck of an accomplishment for one dried up splat of wheat gruel encrusted on a stovetop.

Mav-elous!

Those pesky Mavericks have done it again. On Tuesday night they gave a lickin' to a Shaqless Los Angeles Lakers team that used to laugh at the mere mention of a "Maverick." Laugh no more as the Mavs had Dirk Nowitzki and Steve Nash on the bench by halftime with a comfortable 15-point lead.

"We took care of business," Nowitzki said.

Indeed they did. As for the Lakers they are currently 3-8 without the Big Toe of Shaq, which begs the question, "Does one person make a team?" Kobe Bryant has done his part, averaging over 30 pages, but without a credible inside threat the Lakers are dead in the water.

11-0, that is where the Mavs stand as of Wednesday, tied for 6th place on the all-time NBA best start list. The Mavericks will try to keep climbing the chart with home games Thursday against Houston and Saturday against Seattle. The all-time record is 15-0 by the Rockets in 1993-94 and Washington in 1948-49. So what makes the Mavericks so good?

For starters—trickery. Dallas uses the unorthodox and highly ridiculed zone defense. With "2-3" and "2-1-2" formations, the Mavs have confused opposing teams into many forced shots. Having the seven-foot-six-inch Shawn Bradley in the lane doesn't help either. Mr. 76er Bust has elevated his game this season averaging a sick 3 blocks per game while adding 10 points and 9 boards. Add in the heart and soul of the team embodied by Steve Nash, a scrappy guard who proudly announces his Canadian blood, is the driving force that glues Dirk, Michael Finley and himself together. With German born Dirk Nowitski and Mexican native Edguardo Najera, analysts wonder if the Mavs are the second coming of The United States successful NATO. Getting back to Nash, whenever someone needs to step up with Dirk or Mike in foul trouble, No. 13 gets the call and delivers. How about more than 40 percent from behind the arc for starters?

"Steve Nash's ability/instinct for seeing (and moving into) open spaces before they actually open, for being able to play the game a heartbeat ahead of everyone else, reminds me of a pint-sized Larry Bird," Charley Rosen said on ESPN.com.

Could Big-D's success be directly related to enthusiastic owner Mark Cuban's hush-hush voice this season?

"I just think the league is making good strides. Traveling calls are up 100 percent, carrying (the ball) is up 87 percent, offensive fouls are up 23 percent," Cuban said. "if you've seen me on the sidelines, I haven't mellowed at all. It's just that all the things I've kept track of and made an issue about, they've responded. I've always said the easiest way to shut me up is to just do something. And they have."

One … two … three … four … five ... the sky is the limit. That's what the St. Louis Rams are singing after resurrecting their season with five straight victories. Who is to take credit for all their returned glory? Marshall Faulk ... kinda. Kurt Warner … nope, he's injured. Marc Bulger! Marc who? Yep, following in the footstep of back-ups filling in for injured quarterbacks and actually succeeding (most recently Tom Brady leading the Patriots to the Super Bowl), Bulger, had taken a team that was reserving its January vacation plans to a powerhouse yet again. Sporting a league-leading 106 quarterback rating and connecting for touchdown passes to the likes of Issac Bruce, Bulger has gained the respect and admiration of his most intense critics. Quarterback controversary? There should be! Unfortunately for Bulger fans, he sprained his right index finger on Monday against Chicago. That, coupled with Warner getting a clean bill of health from his doctors, means Warner is back. Besides Mike Martz said from day one, "Kurt is our guy."

Courtesy of Reuters

Back-up Rams quarterback Marc Bulger talking to Head Coach Mike Martz. Bulger has done an excellent job of filling in for the injured Kurt Warner.

Even then, you can bet if Kurt starts to struggle again early Bulger will get the nod to jump in.

Now it's time for my favorite portion of the article—the Decker Effect! This week's award goes to Manute Bol (all 7 feet 7 inches of him) and his attempt at ice hockey stardom. Bol signed with the Indianapolis Ice of the Central Hockey League last week and played in one game. Err, one period ... Manute, the shot blocking king of the NBA years ago has been looking for ways to generate fundraising for his war torn homeland of Sudan. First it was "Celebrity Boxing," now "Big Guy on ice skates." Knockout, the ice won.

Bol spent part of Saturday's game against Amarillo on the bench before his arthritic feet began swelling inside his custom-made ice skates. As such he has put his career on hold indefinitely until they invent the hover skates. On a side note, the game drew a season-high crowd of 5,859.

Legends and their fall

Jerry Rice still runs up and down the sidelines every play. He darts across the middle and takes the hits like he was still 23. Michael Jordan still hits his fade-away jumpers, making those who defend him look like the ankle bone wasn't really a necessary piece of the human skeleton. Mark Messier still places the puck with the precision of a Dennis Miller snipe at Linda Tripp. Jesse Orosco who was on the mound the last time the New York Mets won a World Series 16 years ago just signed a contract with the San Diego Padres.

I see these players on highlight reels on ESPN and think to myself, didn't I see that same exact move about a decade ago when I was still eating hamburger meat with my fingers because I refused to use utensils for a month? What's that all about? Why must the elderly continue to do this to themselves? Can they just move to Miami and punch a few chads?

There must be some reason for them to stick around. A reason beyond "more money" and "love of the game." Those things only take you till about 35. But when you eclipse that 40-year mark, there's something else in it for you.

When Jerry Rice finally retires he will be enshrined into the Hall of Fame with all the speed of a Kato Kaelin-powered Nascar engined with high-efficiency, cryogenic liquid propellant engine and two strap-on solid-fuel boosters. He has nothing left to prove to himself or to the world. I'm not a hockey buff but I'd imagine the same applies to Mark Messier. Michael Jordan has already been inducted, removed, reinstated and removed again from the NBA's Hall of Fame. Hell, does anyone remember when we retired his number? And Jesse Orosco's face has been immortalized in every Shea Stadium poster and Mets paraphernalia since '86, his 15 minutes were up 15 years ago.

Not fame. Not money. Not records. Not love. But then it struck me. They're doing it to be legends. They want to be legends. They want to be in history books. They want their names synonymous with their sport.

They must know by now that legend-hood is a much more voracious beast than that of fame. Anyone can be famous. Britney Spears is famous. But she's far from a legendary diva like Whitney Houston. Being a legend though, that's special.

But then I wondered how we choose our legends? Legends have their own club meetings. Legends have golf courses and failed restaurant chains. Legends have video game series and rap albums, either by them or for them. Legends transcend the social plateau into a much loftier, Olympian (the mountain, not the event) level of fame.

But how do we choose our legends? Let's take football. I could mention the names Johnny Unitas, Joe Namath, Joe Montana, Walter Payton and Vince Lombardi and people would have a vague, if not overly detailed, conception of who I was talking about. Basketball: Wilt Chamberlain, Magic Johnson, Michael Irvin and Larry Bird. Hockey: that guy with the missing teeth, that guy with only one testicle, the guy with the brain hemorrhage and that other guy with the brain hemorrhage (the one who still remembers his name, you know the one I'm talking about). You get the picture.

So what do all those people have in common? Is it how the players treat the media that endears them in our hearts? Is it their accomplishments on the field? Is it their accomplishments off the field? Was it sheer talent or was it hard work and dedication? Was it earned or was it thrust on them?

I'd like to think that it has something to do with heart. I'd like to believe in some sort of ideal that says that we immortalize these athletes because they dedicated themselves to their work with every ounce of strength they could muster and they succeeded when everyone said they couldn't.

But oftentimes it really is the media. My colleagues and I make and break legends. It's not their accomplishments on the field or in the arena, it's the dramatic spin. I'm not saying that I hold that power yet. I write a trashy smut column in a student newspaper … I write the "Days of Our Lives" to Sports Illustrated's "West Wing." But when journalism is done right, it's done to make you feel a certain way, to understand the drama and the tragedy involved in every fourth quarter comeback, every ninth inning rally and every double overtime slug-fest.

I could wax poetic about Michael Jordan's triumphant departure from basketball after his father died and tell you he did it because he didn't feel he could devote himself to the sport anymore. And a month later when he signed with the Chicago White Sox I could tell you it was to fulfill his father's lifelong dream that he make it as a centerfielder in the major leagues. And then a year later when he came out of retirement, I could tell you it was because he wanted to honor his father and his teammates by doing it all over again and championing on to victory.

But I could have also written that he was a quitter. That he had gotten his three championship rings and that he wanted to go out on top and his father's death was a convenient excuse to use. I could go on to say that his return was financially motivated, that he was losing his endorsement deals.

Let's be honest. Jordan was spectacular, but if he had retired after his first three championships and never returned, would we still deify him the way we do? Of course not. We loved it when he came back; the fanfare, the glitter, the cherubim and seraphim playing harpsichords and accordions. And we STILL love it that he's back. Step right up to see the half-man, half-legend. Get your tickets. See the man who walked 500 miles and would walk 500 more just to be the man who walked a thousand miles to fall down on the court. Popcorn to your left.

As a society that says you are a nobody until you are a somebody, I think it's time to take a step back and view some of the finer intricacies of athletics. Let's make MVP races not just about statistics, but about maintaining clubhouse morale. Let's make rewards for those who don't speak with the media, but still devote themselves and their lives to the sports and the people that they love. Let's reward heart. Let's reward overcoming adversity. Let's reward individuality.

Utopian? Maybe. But think of how it feels to root for a man hired to play a sport like an independent contractor, and then think about how it would feel to root for someone who would save your life by pulling you out of a burning automobile.

To Chris Draft and Anthony Thomas … thank you.

NFL Predictions

Cincinnati (1-9) at Pittsburgh (5-5)

So Stewart gets the chance to start a quarterback controversy in the Steel City now that Maddox is benched while he recovers from his cerebral and spinal concussions. This, to all you Steeler faithful I say, is not such a bad thing. Stewart will be pumped to be back in the huddle and ready to show his worth; and if the end of last week's game is any sign then I'm ready to accept Stewart as the starter … only until Maddox returns of course.

Then again, it was Maddox who took his starting job. No matter the quarterback situation, the Steelers need a rushing attack, something they lacked last week in compiling a meager 45 yards on the ground. Wait … they're playing the Bengals … they don't need much to win. Maddox, Stewart, hey, why not let Randle El get a few snaps?

Green Bay (8-2) at Tampa Bay (8-2)

This showdown may determine homefield advantage throughout the NFC playoffs, for these two share the best record in the NFL. The Bucs are riding a three-game winning streak, while the Packers are coming off a surprising loss. I mean, if the Packers can't score enough against the Vikings defense to win, how do they expect to beat the No. 1-ranked defense in the league that is allowing an NFL-low 11.9 points per game. The Packers have lost their last four games in the heat of Tampa … make that five.

San Diego (7-3) at Miami (5-5)

Lucas got his first win, and the Dolphins finally snapped their three-game losing streak, against a team with absolutely no offense, the Ravens. This week they face the league's leading rusher, Tomlinson, who is backed up by a very good Drew Brees passing game. The Dolphins rank 2nd in the NFL against the run, while the Chargers rank 3rd, meaning that this game will turn on the passing game, and there is no contest there. With Fiedler out, the Dolphins' passing game cannot compare to San Diego's. Sorry Flipper, your boys lose.

Indianapolis (6-4) at Denver (7-3)

Some Denver fans may worry that Griese is injured, but I say don't. Denver's back-up, Steve Beuerlein, is good enough to start on half of the other teams in the league. Plus, he will be entering the huddle of the 2nd-ranked offense in the AFC, which consists of a nasty rushing attack led by Clinton Portis. Can anyone say rookie of the year? Furthermore, Denver possesses the best overall defense in the AFC. Does Indy even have a chance? Yes, because they have the Manning to Harrison connection, and the latter leads the league in receiving yardage. So Indy is good, but not good enough. Broncos will stay on pace with the Chargers.

Philadelphia (7-3) at San Francisco (7-3)

The Eagles will be without their MVP, quarterback Donovan McNabb, which almost guarantees defeat to a top caliber team such as the Niners. McNabb has accounted for 65 percent of Philly's offense this season. Can anyone realistically replace that? No, but the Eagles may opt to go more to their running game led by Duce Staley. If the Eagles hope to make up for McNabb's absence they must do it on the defensive side of the ball, with their defense which is ranked 1st against the run and 2nd overall in the NFC. The interesting matchup in the game to watch will be between two all-stars, for Terrell Owens will be matched against Pro Bowl cornerback Troy Vincent. Philly has not lost to an NFC team all season. After this week, they will have.

TRIVIA

2. What active NBA player has been a part of the most double-digit winning streaks?

3. Who are the only two players to end a MLB season with a slugging percentage over .800?

1. One; last Sunday, 11/17/02 because of an ankle injury he suffered on the third play of the game, which he finished; 2. Scottie Pippen has been in 11 double-digit winning streaks in which he played in every game of the streak; 3. Babe Ruth and Barry Bonds.

X-country runs one of its best races all season, with the lady Bison placing 6th

"We've gotten progressively better as a team and individuals this season, and I'm hoping we continue that trend. I'm looking forward to racing again at ECACs," Piper said.

"I thought our women ran a fantastic race. To finish 6th when we were rated 8th is quite an accomplishment considering how young we are. We have a great future ahead of us. These ladies have been improving every race," Head Coach Kevin Donner said.

The women's race was won by Shana LeBeau of West Virginia, younger sister of the notorious Shane LeBeau. Georgetown took home the team title placing five girls in the top 15.

On the men's side, Bryan Johnston '03 once again led the men with his 19th place showing, which was good enough to earn All-Region for the second year in a row. Johnston was with the lead pack early, but a fall around the 2k mark dropped him a number of places. He got up and continued to run tough, but could not regain the ground that he lost to the leaders. Mike Smith from Georgetown ran away with the individual title, while Adrain Blincoe's and Mike Auckenbol's 2nd and 3rd place finishes led Villanova to the team title.

The Bison men's team on a whole ran one of their best races of the season. Lou Palma '03 (61st), Eric Furst '03 (71st), Nick Mousetis '04 (75th) and Stephen Schaefer '04 (80th) made up the top five for the men.

Theresa Dennis '03 negotiates one of the hills at Canaan Valley State Park enroute to a 21st-place finish. The lady Bison placed 6th in the region.

"This weekend was probably the best team race we've had since Great American in September," Furst said.

Donner had projected a finish between 8th and 13th as a team.

"It was nice to see the team bounce back off of a tough league meet," Donner said.

The men's team had mixed reactions. All were glad for the solid team effort, but many couldn't help but want better.

"We had high expectations going into the season based on the performances of our returning runners from the year before. However, as the season progressed, we lost something that no one can quite understand," Furst said. "When Greg [Costello '03] got injured, it was certainly a jolt to the team, and once we understood that we could not go to nationals, the mental edge that we had earlier in the season evaporated."

The Bison harriers will now prepare for the IC4A/ECAC meet held at historic Van Cortland Park in the Bronx this Saturday.

Because there is both an invitational race and an open race, every healthy runner will be able to compete. This will be many seniors' last cross country race ever, and they will be looking to go out in glory.

"This year's race will feature a great Columbia team that finished 2nd at Heps, a Delaware team that beat us at Regionals and possibly some other Ivy League schools that just missed out on Nationals or beat us at the Regional meet. We are the defending champions … our job is to defend the title," Palma said.

Football commences new head coach search

By Cecily Cairns
Sports Editor

The University commenced its nationwide search on Nov. 7 to fill the Bob Odell Head Football Coach position currently held by Tom Gadd. Since it is imperative that the new coach be selected before the off-season recruiting period, a selection committee has been working diligently to review the many candidates and applications.

The committee consists of Director of Athletics and Recreation John Hardt, Professor of Biology Dr. Gary Sojka, Vice President for Student Affairs Charlie Pollack '70 and Senior Associate Director of Athletics Tim Pavlechko '91. In addition to reviewing candidates' qualifications, the committee has asked for the input of alumni, campus constituencies and the national college football community.

"The senior captains of the Bison football team have been consulted and asked to solicit input and feedback from their teammates to share with the committee," Hardt said. "In addition, we have been is close communication with acting Head Coach Dave Kotulski and his staff throughout the process."

Kotulski, who has handled the position of head coach in Gadd's absence, is one of many candidates for the job. In addition to Kotulski, the search committee has received over 100 inquiries regarding the position.

"Due in large measure to the tremendous level of success that the Bison football program has achieved under Coach Gadd's leadership, the interest being expressed in the head coaching position is very high," Hardt said. "The search committee has been impressed with the outstanding quality of the candidate pool, and expects the high level of interest in this position to continue as we move to forward in the process."

Blamah Sarnor '06 carries the ball downfield during an earlier game against Lafayette. Sarnor had 8 carries for 29 yards against Lehigh.

they were going to narrow the deficit at the end of the first half, but Wilson was picked off at the Lehigh 43-yard line with 10 seconds remaining in the half, and the Bison had to go into the locker room down 10 points.

Bucknell looked to put a dent in the Lehigh lead again early in the third quarter. Following a blocked punt, the Bison recovered the ball at the Lehigh 18-yard line. As has been the story for much of the Bucknell 2002 season, the Bison could not capitalize on the good field position. After gaining negative yardage, senior Chris Lundberg's 37-yard field goal attempt hit the crossbar and fell short.

On the ensuing possession, the Mountain Hawks put the game seemingly out of reach. Following a 47-yard run, Lehigh capped off the scoring drive by connecting on a 5-yard touchdown pass to make the score 17-0 with 3:55 to play in the third quarter.

Early in the third quarter the Bison found themselves starting another drive in Lehigh territory. Following a bad punt snap by the Mountain Hawks, the Bison got the ball on the Lehigh 29-yard line. After losing six yards in three plays, the Bison were forced to punt.

"In the second half we presented ourselves with some opportunities, but we couldn't take advantage of them," Head Coach Dave Kotulski said.

On their next possession, the Bison fumbled the ball, and Lehigh recovered on the Bucknell 34-yard line. Lehigh capitalized on Bucknell's mistake, and added another touchdown to make the score 24-0 with 1:30 remaining in the game. The Bison could not move the ball downfield fast enough to put any points on the board, and the final score remained 24-0.

Wet weather and muddy conditions did not help the quick moving quarterback for the Bison, and it proved costly in the end.

"We were playing in atrocious conditions, but the kids still came out and played hard," Kotulski said. "The conditions did not benefit Daris' style of play."

It was a lack of execution that doomed the Bison yet again.

"We haven't executed or performed up to our abilities," Kotulski said.

With the Bison in the midst of a six-game losing streak, they look to put a positive swing on a generally negative season when they host Fordham University on Saturday, Nov. 23, for the final game of the 2002 season.

"The overall attitude have been upbeat and positive. We haven't accepted losing, but we have dealt with it, and next week is an opportunity to end on a positive note," Kotulski said.

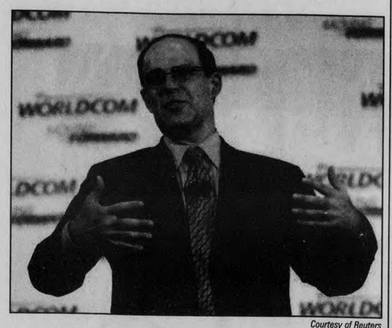
WorldCom Rising?



Courtesy of Reuters

New WorldCom, Inc. CEO Michael Capellas speaks at a press conference in New York. It is hoped that Capellas, former president of Hewlett-Packard, is what the faltering corporation needs.

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

Investors hung up on WorldCom and its CEO Bernard Ebbers this summer, as the company filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in July. There has been a massive Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) investigation and the company is currently in negotiations to settle its charges out of court. A new CEO is on the job and there is much talk about the resurrection of this once powerful corporation.

The New York Times reported that the company, based in Clinton, Miss., is talking with the SEC to settle its corporate fraud charges while four former executives plead guilty to securities fraud. This stems from the company's bankruptcy filing that revealed a massive accounting scandal that may exceed $9 billion. The scandal led to the collapse of the company's stock and massive investor losses on Wall Street.

Former CEO Bernie Ebbers shoulders much of the blame for the problems at WorldCom. Most think he spearheaded the causes that led to the company's downfall. Yet some believe that Ebbers was not so bad.

According to Fortune, "Poor Bernie Ebbers just borrowed money by the barge load. He owes WorldCom $408 million for sure, and as far as anyone can tell he still owes those banks and brokerages more than $1 billion. However … let's remember that Ebbers was different. In his own old-fashioned and quite possibly crooked way—and unlike the others—he at least intended to make himself rich by taking the rest of the shareholders with him."

Last week, the company announced its choice for CEO when it hired former Compaq CEO Michael Capellas, who helped merge Compaq with Hewlett-Packard in a brutal battle. Capellas comes to WorldCom with a long technology background and most believe he will succeed at its helm.

Capellas faces a daunting task to revive the struggling and scandal-wrapped company. According to CNN, "He will set up a formal process for finding new board members and creating a corporate governance structure that he hopes will be a model for corporate America. He expects to create a nominating board that will include the three new directors who have joined the company since it revealed the accounting improprieties. He also expects creditors to participate in the nomination process."

"We have to work on the cost model and return people to believing in the company's integrity," Capellas said in The New York Times. "We will have to rebuild the trust of employees, customers and the world in general. At the end of the day, we, the private sector, the people who run the companies, have to be the ones to make governance real; to take accountability on ourselves."

The company is also dealing with the rumors that former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani is showing interest. According to The Wall Street Journal, "Giuliani has joined with a leading bond investor, David Matlin, to create a fund to raise more than $1 billion to buy up the distressed bonds of WorldCom. Matlin hopes to gain enough clout as WorldCom's biggest creditor to install Giuliani as chairman."

WorldCom may be a way for Giuliani to increase his résumé if he decides to run for office in the future. He is a powerful figure with experience in the law and in running a large organization. His consulting company, Giuliani Partners, is also working in the corporate sector with some high-profile companies in their own trouble, including Merrill Lynch.

As reported in The Wall Street Journal, "political strategists are divided about the wisdom of such a move." David Garth, the veteran New York political consultant and Giuliani ally, described the WorldCom move as a very positive one for his one-time client.

"Man cannot live by bread alone," Garth joked of the financial advantages.

Looking ahead toward a potential Giuliani run for the White House, Garth said that the assignment would round out an already impressive résumé.

WorldCom has a long road ahead of it in the rebuilding process. Many of the services it provides are vital—it is a major long-distance carrier and one of the nation's central Internet backbone providers—and many see its existence as one of supreme importance. Whether Capellas can resurrect the organization and make it viable remains to be seen.

Al Gore returns to the political spotlight

By Mike Dudzinski
Staff Writer

Former U.S. Vice President Al Gore has once again stepped into the political spotlight. This time, he has a different agenda.

Time magazine revealed that Gore has recently drawn public attention in promoting his new book, "Joined at the Heart," as well as a health care proposal that advocates nationwide insurance coverage.

It remains unclear whether Al Gore will seek an election bid to the White House in 2004.

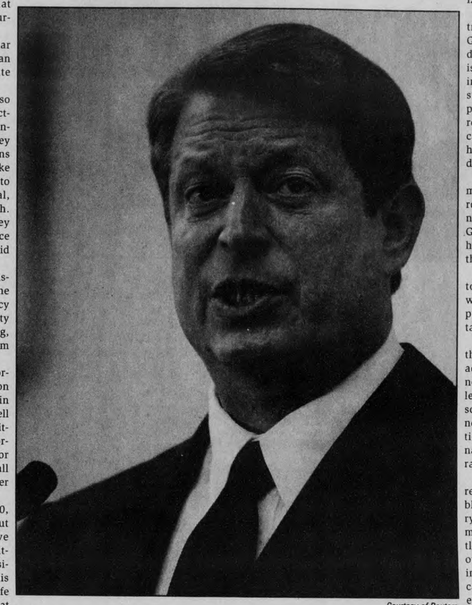
The curiosity has been so widespread that CNN conducted a poll to seek public opinion on the matter. The survey found that most Americans feel that Gore will likely make a run for the presidency to unseat his bitter rival, President George W. Bush. When asked whether they would support the former vice president, less than half said that they would.

Gore will have to administer a flawless campaign if he wishes to seek the presidency again. Although his popularity among the public is fading, you cannot rule out optimism for the future.

CNN emphasized that former President Richard Nixon faced a similar scenario in 1963. Most Americans, as well as Republicans, expressed little interest in seeing the former vice president run for president again. Beating all odds, Nixon triumphed over Hubert Humphrey in 1968.

Just as Nixon felt in 1960, Time magazine pointed out that Gore expresses grave reservations about the outcome of the cutthroat presidential election in 2000. His new book reveals that his wife Tipper is still convinced that he won.

Gore goes as far even to question the legitimacy of the Supreme Court's decision with regard to Bush v. Gore. He believes that the five Republican Supreme Court Justices voted in a manner that is at odds with their political ideology.



Courtesy of Reuters

Former U.S. Vice President Al Gore returns to the political scene with his new book, "Joining at the Heart," and a new health care proposal, as well as various criticisms of the current administration. It remains unclear whether Gore will seek the presidency in 2006.

Aside from his book, the Associated Press noted that Gore has recently made many public appearances advocating health care reform. Aware that as many as 40 million Americans are without health care, the former vice president has proposed national health care coverage for all citizens.

A former critic of a central health care system, Gore reluctantly came to the decision that this objective is the only solution to the impending health care crisis. The Associated Press pointed out that health care reform might serve as a key campaign issue for Gore if he decides to seek the presidency in 2004.

Attacking Bush for commercializing the war on terror and failing to tackle the nation's economic slump, Gore worries that America has a one-way ticket down the wrong path.

He said that if he were to campaign again, he would focus more on big policy issues rather than tactics.

Time magazine revealed that Gore is determined that advocating public awareness of the nation's problems and proposing viable solutions is what America needs from its leader, cautioning Bush's ambiguous nature as highly undemocratic.

Although a presidential rerun may not seem possible for Gore, a look at history suggests otherwise. Time magazine presented a startling fact that Gore pointed out to one of his aides during the final hours of his campaign: If he ran again in eight years, he would be around the same age as Nixon when he won the presidency. Nixon was the last vice president to lose a bitterly contested election.

Florida jury finds gun distributor liable

Valor Corp. to pay $1.2 million in damages for failing to include an internal locking system on its Raven MP-25, following the death of a Florida schoolteacher

By Lindsey Gentel
Writer

For the first time in history, a U.S. jury found a firearms company liable for supplying a gun without an internal locking system. A Palm Beach County jury ordered that Valor Corp., a South Florida gun distributor, pay $1.2 million to the family of murdered teacher Barry Grunow on Nov. 14.

While the verdict was nowhere near the $76 million requested by the attorneys of widow Pam Grunow, they, along with gun control advocates, praised the decision against Valor Corp. as a momentous verdict.

Grunow's attorneys argued that an internal locking system on the gun would not have allowed 13-year-old Nathaniel Brazill to shoot the Lake Worth Middle School teacher two years ago as terrified classmates watched.

Allen Rostron, senior staff attorney for the Brady Center to Prevent Gun Violence, said in an interview with The Sun-Sentinel, "For the purpose of sending a message about gun safety, I think we accomplished everything we wanted to do with this case."

According to the Associated Press, Bob Montgomery, who led the Florida effort to win $11.4 billion from tobacco companies and was one of Grunow's attorneys, said he hopes the case opens the floodgates for lawsuits against firearms companies that manufacture and sell the Raven MP-25.

Valor Corp. insisted a lock on the Raven MP-25, the kind of pistol known as a "Saturday night special" or junk gun, would not have prevented Brazill from pulling the trigger and shooting Grunow in the head.

Montgomery said he is happy with the verdict.

"We're delighted that Valor has been found negligent in this particular case and I hope this will be a clarion call to other suppliers and distributors—get that Saturday night special off the shelf," Montgomery said to CNN.

According The Sun Beach Post, while jurors decided the gun distributor was negligent for failing to incorporate "feasible safety measures" in the Raven Arms .25-caliber semiautomatic handgun, they rejected the main argument of the widow's case that the gun was an unduly hazardous and faulty product. Most of the four-week trial had focused on her attorney's contention that the gun was essentially defective because it served no justifiable function.

The all-woman jury found that the handgun was satisfactory, and that Valor Corp. was only held somewhat responsible for the May 26, 2000 shooting. Jurors found that while the Grunow family suffered $24 million in damages, the gun distributor should only be responsible for paying 5 percent of that amount.

The jury also found the Palm Beach County School Board responsible for Grunow's death because the school did not provide sufficient security measures. The rest of the blame lays with Elmore McCray, the Brazill family friend who owned the gun used in the shooting. Brazill stole the gun from a cookie tin that McCray had hidden in a dresser drawer.

The Grunow v. Valor Corp. case is a rarity because it marks one of the few cases against a firearms company that has gone before a jury. Typically, such cases are dismissed by judges before they ever go to trial and then dragged through the appellate courts for years in plaintiffs' unsuccessful attempts to have the claims reinstated.

Neither Palm Beach County School Board nor McCray was named as a defendant, nor is either responsible for paying any part of the verdict. The School Board reached a $245,160 out-of-court settlement with Grunow two years ago, while McCray's insurance company settled with her for $300,000, according to CNN.

"I think [the decision] has no impact whatsoever on the gun industry nationwide," John Renzulli, Valor Corp.'s lead attorney said in an interview with The Sun-Sentinel. "I think this jury told the gun industry that this gun is not unreasonably dangerous and defective. Bob Montgomery told us that he was going to get $75 million verdict and blow the roof off the courthouse. That's not what happened."

"If somebody gets in [a] car, turns the key and jams on the gas and runs somebody down intentionally, is that car at fault? Is there a defect to that car? Of course not," Renzulli said.

According to the Associated Press, Renzulli hugged several of the jurors after the verdict, thanking them. He said four of them told him they wanted to clear Valor Corp. of any responsibility, but two were holding out for the gun distributor to bear some blame, so they reached a compromise verdict after a little more than six hours of deliberations.

The Grunow v. Valor Corp. case is a rarity because it marks one of the few cases against a firearms company that has gone before a jury. Typically, such cases are dismissed by judges before they ever go to trial and then dragged through the appellate courts for years in plaintiffs' unsuccessful attempts to have the claims reinstated.

By arguing the case as a product liability, because the gun was inherently defective, Montgomery was able to successfully ward off Valor Corp.'s attempts to have Circuit Judge Jorge Labarga dismiss the lawsuit outright.

According to The Palm Beach Post, Montgomery argued that Valor Corp. should have incorporated a lock into each Raven Arms .25-caliber semi-automatic, which would make it impossible to operate without a key. A gunsmith testified for Grunow that such a device would cost less than $4 to install on the pistol.

McCray testified he would have used such a lock if it had been on the gun and kept the key with him.

Gary Mehalik, spokesman for the National Shooting Sports Foundation, told CNN that it was outrageous that the jury even found the gun distributor 5 percent responsible.

"Valor Corp. sold this firearm 10 years ago legally, it was stolen and used by a criminal and holding a distributor responsible flies in the face of established law," Mehalik said.

John Hlawka, the widow's father, said the verdict, big or small, does nothing to ease the pain of his daughter and her children.

"I'm not thrilled with any kind of money and neither is Pammy," Hlawka said to The Sun-Sentinel. "A lot of people have the right to have guns, but this weapon was a piece of crap, and I think everybody knows it."

He anticipates the case will wind its way through the appellate courts.

"Harry Potter" makes magic

Courtesy of Reuters

"Harry Potter and the Chamber of Secrets" stars Daniel Radcliffe and Emma Watson pose with author J.K. Rowling at the movie's world premiere in London. This movie's plot is more intricate than the first.

By Kristi Johnston
Arts & Entertainment Editor

The "Harry Potter" series is alive and well. Though it didn't gross as much money in the first weekend as its predecessor, "Harry Potter and the Chamber of Secrets," the latest movie based on the hit J.K. Rowling book series, dominated both ticket sales and movie gossip this weekend. This time, the kids have matured, the storyline is more complex and the quidditch is more intense.

Movie Review 4.5/5

A year after "Harry Potter and the Sorcerer's Stone," most of the original cast returns for the latest edition. Harry (Daniel Radcliffe) is still being tormented by his abusive aunt and uncle, Ron (Rupert Grint) is still getting into trouble with his large magical family and Hermione (Emma Watson) is still reading everything she can get her hands on.

"Harry Potter and the Chamber of Secrets" is not just an updated version of "Harry Potter and the Sorcerer's Stone." Despite taking place once again at Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry, the plot is much darker and more intricate than that of the original.

Harry is warned by a computer-animated house elf, Dobby, not to return to Hogwarts. Of course, he does not heed this advice. Once back at school, he starts hearing strange voices in the walls, speaking a language he has never heard before and defending himself against accusations that he is trying to rid the school of non-pureblood magicians. Viewers see Harry's struggles with his own identity and the potential powers he possesses.

Add to this complex storyline dazzling special effects and ominous evil creatures and this movie is clearly not just for kids.

"I really liked the movie," Christie Crawford '03 said. "However, it didn't follow the book as much as the first one did, and I think it would be pretty scary for kids."

Joining Professors Dumbledore (the late Richard Harris), McGonagall (Maggie Smith) and Snape (Alan Rickman) is the arrogant and self-absorbed Gilderoy Lockhart (Kenneth Branagh). Also new to the cast is Jason Isaacs as Lucius Malfoy, the creepy father of Harry's arch enemy, Draco (Tom Felton).

Though the movie does not follow the book exactly, it only omits those details that are unnecessary to the overall story. (The movie is 2 hours and 41 minutes long despite these deletions.)

The child actors have obviously matured, but still retain the innocence and curiosity that are inherent in the personae of their characters. Branagh and Isaacs add the perfect blend of humor and icy intensity, respectively, to the mix. Harry Potter may not be on his way to the Academy Awards any time soon, but he definitely knows how to conjure up a lot of fun.

Satirical book describes college life

"Student Body Shots" is a humorous, yet accurate, look at college

By Leah Cunningham
Staff Writer

Somehow, the quintessential aspects of college life—laundry, Instant Messenger, Greek life, alcohol, sleep and showers—are familiar at colleges and universities across the nation. Steve Hofstetter, author of "Student Body Shots: A Sarcastic Look at the Best 4-6 Years of Your Life," candidly satirizes these so-called fundamentals by finding hilarious life lessons in even the most mundane and ridiculous phases of everyday college life.

A 2002 graduate of Columbia University's School of General Studies, Hofstetter is a co-creator of Jerkoftheweek.com, a sports humor site, and is the author of "Observational Humor."

In a word, "Student Body Shots" is hilarious. If you are a fan of Jack Handey's "Quotes on Life" on "Saturday Night Live," this is your type of humor. This 99-pager does not involve deep philosophies or long-winded views on life, but is filled with sarcastic and comical revelations about college life. Hofstetter is strangely effective in his simplicity because his conclusions are true.

"Student Body Shots" has a foreword written by the popular "Boy Meets World" star Rider Strong. The book proceeds to follow with commentary divided into such categories as sleep, money, parties, dorms, hooking up and even winter break.

Book Review

In his section called "The Gym," Hofstetter says, "You're not healthy just because you work out. You eat Ramen for lunch, pizza for dinner and you've never been awake for breakfast. You drink all weekend, spend your time IMing your roommate and go to sleep at 4 a.m. on a Tuesday. But those three sets of bicep curls—man, they're keeping you healthy."

Hofstetter makes light of those events that sometimes go unnoticed but are an integral part of college life. In the "Money" chapter, he recounts, "The only kind of money college students ever have is a 20 dollar bill. Since ATMs only give out 20s, you end up going to dinner with five people and no one has change. One guy ends up covering it, and everyone says they'll pay him back as soon as they get change. Which never happens."

Hofstetter is witty with all of his opinions. His section on winter break reminds the typical college student of the regressions of returning home. "When you go home for winter break, you're like 'Score! A month off!' Then you spend a week with no drinking, lots of nagging and the terrible thought that you have three more weeks of this."

Hofstetter is essentially Ferris Bueller as an author. He reminds the reader that "the great thing about college is that regardless of if you want to study, party, do both or do neither, there will be a place for you somewhere."

This guide-to-life handbook packed with smug commentary is sure to at least crack a smile in any college student. If nothing else, Hofstetter gives compelling advice on how to read your hallmates and friends through their "college-typical" behavior.

"You can tell a lot about someone by what they keep in their shower basket. Four different shampoos means they're obsessed with their appearance.

Neat labels mean they're anal. And a tube of foot fungus cream means they probably forgot to buy shower shoes."

By Kristen Habacht

The youngest of three sisters, Elizabeth "Ibby" Cizmar '03 has made quite a name for herself in the University theatre department. Having acted in over 10 productions on campus, not to mention various Cocktail plays, Cizmar, a theatre and political science major, is no stranger to the stage.

Cizmar came to the University to enjoy a smaller theater program that allowed for more personal attention and opportunity. She soon realized that finding her niche was the key to getting the most out of the University. Cizmar is a member of the Pi Beta Phi sorority and was its recruitment chair this fall. She also played varsity tennis during her first and second years, but theater has allowed her the real opportunity to find her place at the University.

She has supplemented her experiences here with two summer internships at the Atlantic Theater Company and one internship in which she taught theater classes.

This spring, Cizmar is taking over the role of co-director of "The Vagina Monologues," along with Lee Cromwell '05. She is excited about the opportunity.

"I feel that [the 'Monologues' have] already impacted the campus—the way people look at women and their struggles," she said. "So many people that I've talked to have said that it has changed the way they look at themselves and the world and that's what we want. It should make you think. It's interesting and fun, as well as intellectual."

"The Vagina Monologues" is opening just days after Cizmar's main stage acting showcase, "Oleanna," closes. The showcase, also her senior thesis, is a two-person power play that brings back alumnus Marc Powers '74 to play the male lead and is directed by Associate Professor of Theatre Bob Gainer.

Cizmar is breaking the mold by having an acting showcase—most seniors choose to direct. She is excited about the opportunity to perform the showcase.

"'Oleanna' gets people thinking about difficult issues," Cizmar said. "I want to change the conventional way people think."

Cizmar is not acting to become famous; she is doing it for herself and to make an impact.

After graduation, Cizmar plans to attend graduate school for theater.

Lema rumored to be leaving University

Bucknellian Archives

By Sandi-Jo Galati
Associate Editor

Sources within the University have informed The Bucknellian that Vice President for Finance and Administration Jo-Anne Lema will be leaving the University. The circumstances surrounding her departure remain unspecified.

University President Steffen Rogers was unavailable for interview due to off-campus engagements since Wed. morning. Rogers described the situation in a phone conversation as an "active personnel issue" and declined further comment.

Vice President of Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 also declined to comment.

Sources indicated that Associate Vice President for Facilities Dennis Hawley '72 and Associate Vice President Finance/Controller Dennis Swank will serve as interim replacements. Both Hawley and Swank served as interims in the position prior to the hiring of Lema last Fall.

The Bucknellian will continue to investigate this issue and provide the complete story when the University releases an official statement.

Community members will not be issued memberships to the new Recreation and Athletics Center (RAC) until the University determines to what extent, if at all, non-University memberships can be offered. Student, faculty and staff memberships will remain full time.

University slow to extend RAC memberships to community

By Jennifer Jenchura
Senior Writer

The University administration is currently reviewing its policy towards community memberships at the new Recreation and Athletics Center (RAC) that opened in October. A formal policy will be announced in January.

"We are proceeding with caution and not rushing to a premature conclusion because we want to get it right the first time rather than later having to revoke memberships or do anything that would cause further consternation to the community," University President Steffen Rogers said.

In the meantime, people who pay annual dues will continue to be renewed on a semi-annual basis. Current lifetime members will continue to be allowed to use the Fieldhouse but, until the University determines risk management and usage patterns, they will not have their memberships extended to the RAC.

College-aged students from other schools will continue to be permitted to use the University's athletics and recreation facilities during school vacation periods by showing a valid college picture ID. Although the new policy could change community members' access to the new facility, it is unlikely that faculty and staff will be affected.

"The privileges for faculty, staff and their dependents are likely to remain exactly as they have been—full usage," University General Counsel Wayne Bromfield said.

In order to make the decision, the University is reviewing several factors associated with opening a brand new athletic facility to the community. They are investigating risk management safety issues, insurance and tax implications. The ultimate decision on outside memberships will be based on usage patterns of students and staff in the University community.

"If, after that analysis, we can also accommodate outside memberships, we will determine how many and under what conditions. The real issue concerns memberships to community citizens—How many, at what price? In the past, a limited number of community members have been allowed to use the facilities for an annual fee. With increased safety and security concerns, we are assessing what that policy will be going forward," Bromfield said.

The University also needs to make sure the greater amount of people using the facility will not

Trustees approve merit aid pilot plan

By Sandi-Jo Galati

The Board of Trustees approved the merit aid pilot plan in a unanimous vote during its Nov. 23 meeting. The verdict enables the athletics department to begin awarding basketball scholarships immediately, while the admissions office may offer non-athletic packages beginning March 1.

"This was a good process for Bucknell," Vice President of Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 said. "Merit aid was on the agenda of the Committee for Admissions and Financial Aid almost two years ago and really was given thoughtful consideration. It is a process of which the University can be proud, with an outcome which I am equally confident will be a positive experience."

The University hopes to accomplish several goals with the implementation of merit aid. They include the enrollment of more students academically, strengthening the reputation of the University, increasing diversity on campus, drawing more performing arts talent on campus, drawing more middle-income students to the University, solidifying overall financial assistance and promoting athletic equality—particularly in basketball—among the other schools in the Patriot League that offer merit aid.

"We are very much in competition for a relatively small number of students who both recognize the virtues of institutions like Bucknell are capable of doing the work here. We can't afford to operate in a vacuum," Pollock said.

The Patriot League decided to implement merit aid in 1998. By not offering merit aid, the University had isolated itself with Colgate University and the Ivy League in its refusal to offer merit aid.

Men's basketball Head Coach Pat Flannery and women's basketball Head Coach Kathy Fedorjaka are allotted three scholarships for each of their teams, which they were able to offer immediately follow-

Off-campus housing issue to be reviewed in January

By Elisabeth Salemme
News Editor

The University Board of Trustees discussed the question of housing all students on campus at their meeting last week. The matter will be discussed further at its January meeting, when the board will revisit its 1998 plan to bring all students back to campus from town, as well as more recent notions about doing this in approximately the next five years.

According to University Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70, at the January meeting the Board of Trustees will discuss how to try to accommodate all students on campus by 2007.

"The possible outcomes of the January meeting are to continue on the current course slowing down the timetable for new housing but proceeding with the fundamental goal, or possibly tabling the idea indefinitely," Pollock said.

According to Pollock, a significant factor the board will have to consider when they revisit the earlier plans of this year is the current unbalance in the University budget. He said the board will also have to consider the change in the nation's economy "that will make funding tight" in the future.

The task force of Borough of Lewisburg and University personnel that will study possibilities for the local neighborhoods, where students currently reside in great numbers, will

Hunt Hall renovation on schedule

Sorority dorm to reopen doors after fall semester

By Meghan Fox
Staff Writer

After students return from winter break, the sorority women currently living in Vedder Hall will move into the newly restored Hunt Hall. At this time, restoration of the east wing of Vedder will begin.

Hunt is currently under construction and has been so since commencement last spring. The building was built in the late 1920s as a residence hall for women. The last restoration made on Hunt building occurred in 1978.

By Jan. 15, Hunt will be reopened with improved accommodations and additional facilities. The building is now equipped with air conditioning and an elevator, and provides distinct locations for each sorority to live.

"It was a renovation to personal space and an upgrade," Assistant Dean of Students and Director of Housing and Residential Life Daniel Remley said.

Five million dollars was poured into the project, which Remley said will "strengthen the living and sorority existence. The building is now dedicated to sorority uses."

Kappa Alpha Theta Sorority member Jackie Millinder '04 will be moving into Hunt next semester.

"I am very excited about moving into Hunt," Millinder said.

Besides transferring to a newly remodeled building, Millinder and other sorority members will also benefit from larger common rooms designated to each sorority for their personal use.

The University attempted to provide equivalent accommodations to the sororities displaced by the renovation by housing the women in Vedder. The loss of 140 rooms due to construction called for adjustments to be made throughout campus. Smith Hall triples were made into quads, five students were placed in mods that normally housed four and addi-

A. S. Kiken event: an evening of wine

By Aaron DeRosa

Four empty glasses, one plastic cup, one green bucket, a carafe of water, two trays of cheese and grapes, two baskets of bread and crackers and nine bottles of wine. Last Tuesday, the University held its first wine tasting seminar in the Terrace Room.

The event was sponsored by the Office of the Dean of Students, University Relations and the Career Development Center (CDC).

University alumnus and owner of the Reverie Vineyard and Winery in Calistoga, Calif., Norm Kiken '64 hosted the event. Starting with an informal lecture regarding how he got into the wine business, Kiken introduced the crowd of about 100 to the production and distribution of wine.

The idea of a wine tasting at the University is not unique to this event.

"The wine tasting is nothing new," Dean of Students Kari Conrad said. "The Career Development Center used to have wine tasting as a part of its etiquette dinner."

In a semester that has also seen the introduction of pub nights to Uptown in an effort to promote responsible drinking, the idea of a wine tasting is not wholly without merit. The intention of the event, however, was completely different.

"The main thing to remember is that this wasn't a wine tasting 'party.' It was a 'seminar.' This was an opportunity for students to learn about the wine industry and wine etiquette," Conrad said.

Intended to be an introductory lesson, Kiken described the fermentation, pressing and aging process that goes into a harvest. The evening began with a slide show and short lecture followed by the wine tasting, during which Kiken answered questions regarding the entire process, as well as providing insight into types of wines that are appropriate at certain settings.

Additionally, Kiken demonstrated the proper eti-

Calling the University "an absolute disgrace," civil rights activist David Horowitz spoke about conservative politics and destructive liberal ideals.

Horowitz criticizes liberal ethic in speech

By Jeff Day
Staff Writer

David Horowitz captured the attention of students, faculty and citizens alike in the Gallery Theater on Monday night as he scornfully addressed leftist ideals and the University's education.

Horowitz, a lifelong civil rights activist, lectured to the audience and commented about "why he left the left." He stated that progressive had no way of redressing its wrongs, and witnessed too many murders go unpunished because of liberal beliefs.

"The left is always defending guilty people," Horowitz said.

According to Horowitz, leftists have been wrong about everything important in the 20th century. He feels that socialism is merely a fantasy about a world redeemed, and that there is truly no such thing as economic justice.

New faculty evaluations approved

Trustees give nod to faculty-generated rating system

By Michelle Dombeck
Managing Editor

The Board of Trustees recently approved the faculty's proposal for faculty evaluations. This plan involves a new rating scale and the addition of a non-salary related annual review. New faculty evaluations under this plan will begin this spring.

Faculty members are pleased with the decision.

"It was a good proposal, and I'm happy to see it go through," Assistant Professor of Chemistry Alison Draper said. "Perhaps more importantly though, it's a signal that the trustees are willing to let us govern ourselves and design a system that we think most appropriate to evaluate ourselves."

According to Draper, this system is very similar to the one in place from 1998-2001. The old system evaluated tenured faculty every three years in the areas of teaching, scholarship and service on a quota-based 0-4 scale. The sum of these scores was used to determine how much merit pay a faculty member received.

The new system also evaluates faculty for merit-based salary increases triennially, but is on a 0-5 scale that is no longer quota-based. This allows faculty to be evaluated on objective standards rather than being compared to each other.

According to Provost and Vice-President for Academic Affairs Stephen Bowen, faculty members can now focus less on competition and more on their individual work.

In addition, there is also a new, annual evaluation that is not tied to salary increases.

"The purpose of these annual submissions is to enable the chair to advise colleagues who are having difficulty with a particular course of the availability of developmental support (such as course-development grants or summer teaching institutes) or other forms of assistance," said Michael Payne, professor of English and chair of the faculty. "This annual part of the process, in other words, is intended to emphasize development rather than evaluation."

Much effort was placed into making this plan one that would be acceptable to the faculty, trustees and administration.

"The faculty worked hard to meet the trustees' expectations, and the trustees were very supportive in responding to faculty concerns. The final product is one that the trustees find acceptable, that honors faculty priorities, and that the administration believes will be workable," Bowen said.

Now that the proposal has been approved, the faculty members will begin planning for the upcoming evaluations.

"It was particularly important that the new plan be approved at the Nov. 23 board meeting, since the faculty will need as much time as possible to gather the information that will serve as the basis for reviews to be conducted this coming spring," Bowen said. "Letters to the third of the faculty who will be reviewed this coming spring will be sent out this week."

quette involved at a wine tasting, as well as in a business setting.

"In the business world, these things happen all the time," Conrad said. "We want students to know the etiquette involved in ordering a glass of wine at a restaurant while on business."

Students at each table engaged themselves in a discussion of the wine, speculating on the particular flavors and ingredients of the samples. The first selection, a white zinfandel, seemed to be everyone's least favorite because of its strong sweetness. Kiken explained that this particular wine, known popularly as a rosé wine, is technically white, though made from red grapes.

While Kiken fielded questions from the audience, servers provided six more samples for the tasters, ranging from chardonnay to pinot noir and merlot. One of the special wines featured was the A. S. Kiken red table wine, straight from Kiken's Napa Valley vineyard.

"My favorite wines were the reds, especially the cabernet franc and the A.S. Kicken wine," Alison Landgraf '03 said. "I always seem to prefer the reds because they're not as sweet as white wines can be."

At one point, each participant tried to imitate the proper wine tasting technique that Kiken demonstrated, swirling and aerating the wine within the mouth before swallowing. Taking proper care to cleanse the palate with the provided cheese and bread, each taster was able to compare seven wines in all, many side-by-side, to determine their personal preference.

Students did not hesitate to take advantage of Kiken's first-hand experience with wine, asking candidly for advice on the best value in wine for a college student. Kiken recommended Australian wines like shiraz, or Chilean brands. As a finale, students were treated to a final sample of cabernet sauvignon, an expensive and acclaimed red wine from the Reverie Vineyard.

The wines were all generously donated by Kiken and fellow Bucknell alums Ed Farver '69, general manager of the Cardinale and Pepe brands at Kendall-Jackson Wine Estates and Berenger Blass Wine Estates Vice President of Sales David Biggar '82.

violate any safety codes. At the time the new RAC first opened there was a big rush to use the new facility. The increased student usage of the facility affects the amount of memberships that can be offered.

"We are tremendously pleased with the student utility—during some hours of the day all aerobic equipment and most anaerobic machines are in use. If that continues, we will obviously have to curtail outside memberships, or restrict the hours of allowable use," Bromfield said.

The administration is still trying to understand the usage patterns of students to find out if the high student volume continues. Usage rates are being carefully monitored through the checking of identification at the door.

"We will need to see how many people are using the facilities and at what hours in order to have staff on duty to reduce risks. If someone were to get hurt, Bucknell would have a liability and we have to be cognizant of that fact," Rogers said.

Although community members have an interest in using University facilities as they have in the past, the facility was built primarily for student use and secondarily for faculty usage.

"If we permit outside memberships to continue, we have several categories to consider—present members, alumni and donors, longstanding community supporters and adult members of Bucknell employees' families. All deserve consideration, but we cannot displace students and present staff, nor can we ignore risk management issues," Bromfield said.

There are other outside stakeholders as well. The new RAC does not want to compete with local providers and health clubs.

"We don't want to be competitors with any other facility in the area. However, we also want to be a good neighbor and contributing member of the community," Rogers said.

Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

Construction continues at the Recreation and Athletic Center. The University administration is currently reviewing the policy for community memberships at the new center.

"After we weigh all those factors, and continue to evaluate usage patterns as the rest of the Recreation and Athletic Center opens, we will be in a position to communicate a final policy on outside memberships. It is likely that a limited number of memberships may become available," Bromfield said.

Originally, the administration was to decide on the new policy prior to Dec. 1, so that any policy change on third party memberships could be effective by Jan. 1, 2003. The new goal is to have a formal policy announced sometime in January, although that policy may not be finalized until the next fiscal year, beginning July 1, 2003.

"We will extend the process until we feel comfortable with the decision. We don't want to leave the impression with the community that we don't want to [extend memberships], we just want to do the right thing for Bucknell and the community," Rogers said.

Conservatives Club receives national coverage on "Counterweight" issue

By Rachel Laskow
Senior Editor

The Bucknell University Conservatives Club (BUCC) received national coverage in the November 2002 issue of "The Campus Report," a newspaper published by Accuracy in America (AIA). "Staff of Bucknell Conservative Paper Threatened at Secret Meeting," by Campus Report Managing Editor Sara Russo, talks about the meeting that was held at the University after the release of the Oct. 4 issue of "The Counterweight."

"I'm still impressed that this story made it to a national publication. I think this shows the significance of what's happened. If what went on is normal or acceptable, I doubt it would have been covered," BUCC President Denise Chaykun '04 said.

The Daily Item also covered this issue a few weeks ago, but according to "The Counterweight" Editor-in-Chief Charles Mitchell '05, the Campus Report reaches a much broader audience.

"I think the fact that the people at AIA thought our story was compelling enough to take up a page and a half shows just how heavy-handed the administration's treatment of the BUCC and free expression in general is, and how apparent it is to people who don't have their offices in Marts Hall or the Langone Center," Mitchell said.

According to Russo, the Campus Report was moved to cover the issue because it presented a clear-cut case of administrative bias against a conservative organization, which was excluded from a secret meeting held about its own publication.

"Our mission at Accuracy in America is to restore higher education to its original purpose, which we believe is to search for truth," Russo said. "We believe that there is an overwhelming left-wing bias on most college campuses that prevents conservative viewpoints from being heard, and so when we hear about instances in which conservative students or faculty members are being denied equal treatment, we do our best to publicize these instances so that the situation can be remedied."

> —Denise Chaykun '04, BUCC president*

Russo read the articles "1st Amendment protects even blackface," by Tom Elliot '03, and "Bias-related harassment, or just plain BS?" by Michael Boland '03 in the Oct. 4 "Counterweight" and did not find any racial bias or insensitivity.

"I think the most interesting facet of the story was the decision to call a meeting about 'The Counterweight' articles in the first place," Russo said.

Mitchell said he has not heard anything from the administration about the Campus Report article.

"That's part of the problem—it seems that they think they can ignore us and we will go away. But it's not that simple," Mitchell said.

Dean of Students Richard Ferraro said he did not read the article and could not comment on it.

"I think that this situation has clearly gotten out of hand because the administration fails to admit that it acted unprofessionally and with undue bias towards 'The Counterweight'," Russo said.

Campus Report Editor Dan Flynn will be speaking on campus next semester. According to Mitchell, Flynn is not coming to the University because he is editor of the Campus Report; he is coming here to talk about his new book "Why the Left Hates America: Exposing the Lies that Have Obscured our Nation's Greatness."

"This University is an absolute disgrace because there are no conservatives on the administrative board," Horowitz said.

According to Horowitz, students cannot receive a good education if they are only being told half of the story even if they are paying more than $30,000 a year.

Audience members were told that the University is close-minded to conservative ideas and, although University students study the readings of liberal authors Karl Marx and Howard Zinn, there are no required readings of the conservative approach toward economics.

Charles Mitchell, editor of "The Counterweight," was thrilled with the attendance at Horowitz's speech and agreed with much of what was said. Mitchell believes that students need to be educated by a balanced faculty, and that an overabundance of conservative professors would be a problem as well.

"We need to start looking into the reason for the exclusion of conservative professors," Mitchell said.

Horowitz further stated that he withdrew from the progressive party due to the destructive nature of the left.

"Socialism is a stupid, evil, destructive and bankrupt idea that is being taught at Bucknell today," Horowitz said. "For the past 50 years, every inner city in America and every school board has been controlled by the left, and thus the cause of their demise."

The 20th century has been one of genocides, including the leftist belief to allow communists to win the Vietnam War.

"Hidden by the slogan, 'Bring the Troops Home Now,' liberals merely wanted us to lose the war," Horowitz said.

He also commented on the Living Wage movement at the University. Horowitz stated that if you try to organize a society where everyone has enough money, you end up with a society where everyone is poor. He also stands against affirmative action and asked, "Who accomplished anything by lowering the bar?"

"Horowitz spoke in a logical manner and made many good points to which I agree," Scott Messinger '06 said. "However, he did a lot of complaining instead of saying how things can be changed."

Much of Horowitz's "complaining" centered on the United States being blamed and ridiculed for its foreign policy. He stated that the Middle East is poor because of the Middle Easterners that run it, Iraq is not being attacked for oil, but rather for our citizen's safety and that Palestinians may be the worst enemy that we have ever faced.

The United States has a conscience and is the only country in which its foreign policy and national security are directed by minorities.

"We are systematically being taught to despise our country and be embarrassed by it instead of being proud of it," Horowitz said. "If you cannot be proud of your country, you cannot defend yourself."

According to Denise Chaykun, president of the Conservatives Club, David Flint will be speaking in February, and the club hopes to have actor Ben Stein speak to the campus about his new book, "Why the Left Hates America: Expressing the Lies that Have Obscured our Nation's Greatness."

HOUSING

begin next year.

"It was always understood that going forward with our plans would depend on our ability to foresee a positive future for the affected neighborhoods," Pollock said. "If the task force looking at alternative futures were to find only bleak ones, then our plans could not go forward in either the borough's or the University's interests."

Pollock said the task force will consider what can replace the current student rentals in the nearby neighborhoods.

Issues that Pollock said the board will consider are whether or not owner-occupied, single-family housing will ever work in the area again, given the current condition of some of the properties, whether or not the land can be put to commercial or recreational use, what, if any, consequences there would be to the borough's tax base and if an appealing solution cannot be reached, what the negative outcomes would be likely.

Pollock said the administration will prepare a comprehensive background paper for the Trustee meeting in January, to articulate all the pros and cons a change in housing policy would have.

"What are the educational issues, the safety issues, the town-gown relations issues and so forth? Also, since money is tight, how would Bucknell pay for new land and for new structures—borrowing, for example? We will include the viewpoints of the many constituencies we've heard from—neighbors, current students, parents, landlords and many others, as well as student life professionals—and we will report any early findings of the task force," Pollock said. "The idea is to make the most informed decision possible, leaving no stone unturned as far as considerations go."

According to Dean of Students Richard Ferraro, it would only be possible to bring students back on campus if appropriate apartment-style housing would be available.

"I am excited about the potential of building brand new condo-type housing on campus," Ferraro said.

According to Ferraro, if students are brought back on campus, the money paid as rent will be able to support the construction of these buildings.

"It is like building a house," Ferraro said. "The buildings will be paid for over time, especially because of the state of the economy."

Ferraro said he does not think anything will be done about housing students on campus in the near future due to the economy, the high interest of students to live downtown and the landlords' opposition to moving students out of the downtown area.

"People are much better now than when I first started working at Bucknell," Ferraro said. "There are fewer fist-fights, fewer situations with loudness and students have improved overall downtown."

University looks for edge on competition

ing the Board of Trustees decision due to the compressed enrollment season for athletics.

Nearly all of the funding necessary to support the basketball merit aid awards has been raised, but if the remaining amount is not donated, the Bison Club has promised to supplement the fund, according to Vice President of Enrollment Management Kurt Thiede and Pollock.

The money necessary for four of the 36 non-athletic awards is available so far, but according to Thiede the University expects more contributions to be made toward the merit aid fund now that it has been approved.

Since the enrollment season is already in progress, merit aid will not be used as a recruitment tool for the Class of 2007, and only the scholarships for which funding is available by March 1 will be awarded.

"We will proceed as normal with our admissions program and start building our projection matrices to get a sense of how many acceptances we will offer and in which categories," Thiede said. "Then we will see when March 1 approaches what merit aid money we have to spend and we will determine out of these groups, students will receive merit scholarships."

Funding for all 42 scholarships is expected to be available to the Class of 2008, and merit aid will become part of admissions publicity in the recruitment of this class.

"Next year we ought to be able to use merit aid to attract students who wouldn't have otherwise applied," Pollock said.

The 42 total awards outlined by the pilot plan will affect roughly 5 percent of the accepted class when the plan is fully implemented. Ten of these awards will be given to no-need students, while the remaining 32 will be offered to students demonstrating financial need. Roughly 3 percent of the total financial aid budget will be appropriated to merit aid, and 1 percent of the budget will awarded to no-need students

"The whole merit-based program, beyond need or no-need, is very modest. Given our total financial aid commitment that is primarily need-based, it is really a drop in the ocean," Pollock said. "The reason for that is that we want to do this in a very controlled and contained fashion, then choose to continue it or not continue it after three years."

The pilot program was designed with three-year limit, after which the Committee on Admissions and Financial Aid expects to have collected enough data to determine the future of the program. The Board of Trustees plans to review this information in September 2005.

"The hope is that we will amass data that will give people the confidence that we can control this and that it achieves the purpose we said it would," Pollock said.

The Board of Trustees conceptually approved the goals of merit aid during its April 27 meeting, at which point the board commissioned the Committee on Admissions and Financial Aid to draft a preliminary plan for merit aid implementation, abiding by several limitations.

Specific expectations established by the Board of Trustees included developing a finance plan involving fundraising, maintaining the current socioeconomic environment of the University, limiting the non-athletic to athletic dollars spent to a 3-1 ratio and establishing annual goals for review.

"There were many expectations when the plan was put together—performing arts, diversity, academics and athletics were all features that we wanted to consider," Thiede said. "We need to build a program design that would address and balance these different variables while giving us enough impact to yield students in each of these areas."

Thiede likened the University's conscientious approach to merit aid to a marketing strategy that the University will utilize to attract future students.

"In my experiences with other institutions, this is by far the most cautious approach to merit aid I have seen. At present, Bucknell is in such a strong position and does not require a more aggressive merit scholarship plan," Thiede said. "However, in terms of planning for the future, this gives us an opportunity to test merit scholarships at Bucknell within the student market"

According to Thiede, the University has no intention of drastically altering any aspect of the admissions pool, just expanding the margins to include some of the students it was previously able to attract but not enroll.

"I think that the quality of our pool has been so strong that I don't anticipate that the existence of a merit program at Bucknell is necessarily going to generate a different kind of quality," Thiede said. "In the recent past we just haven't been competitive enough to enroll as many of our top-flight applicants as we would like."

Despite some opposition to the implementation of merit aid, both Pollock and Thiede described the merit aid program as simply an extension to the University's commitment to maintaining its socioeconomic background and increasing awareness of its commitment to accommodating the financial needs of all students.

"If we did unanimously believe that merit aid was evil and a financial mistake of epic proportions, it would behoove us to be cognizant of, but ignore, what other institutions are doing," Pollock said. "We don't believe that. We recognize that if we can do as we have committed to do, we will not diminish our commitment to need-based aid and to providing access to all students, regardless of their socioeconomic circumstances."

Vedder construction to begin in the spring

tional individuals were placed into converted rooms in other dormitories across campus.

"All space was reviewed and the most appropriate 140 spaces were chosen," Remley said.

Construction in both Hunt and Vedder is taking place during the same academic school year to minimize the discomfort of housing complications. After the sororities move out, their wing will undergo construction as part of phase one renovation in Vedder.

Phase two will occur in the center and west wings over the summer and is to be completed before the next fall semester begins. Housing will be appropriately regulated next fall.

"The intention is to resort back to the 2001-2002 model, which should see an increased number of singles and a reduction of quads to triples and triples to doubles," Remley said.

Millinder, who has lived in Vedder over the past semester, said he has very few complaints about the building.

"I like living in Vedder," she said. "I would say the only bad thing about is that the rooms aren't in the best shape."

Others feel more strongly about the building's current condition.

Chaz Wattles '06 complained about the faulty plumbing, which has caused him scalding hot showers on many occasions.

A budget of approximately $6 million was initially planned for the renovation of the building and the implementation of additional programs for within. Due to the financial implications of 9/11, the projected budget could not be met.

"We took a substantial hit since the market downturn," Remley said. "Vedder was more expensive then originally expected."

The University has decided to only go forward with the most pressing issues within Vedder.

The improvements in Vedder are to be "more structural in nature," according to Remley, who also said there will be an infrastructure change, the plumbing will be updated and the bathrooms will be improved.

Remley feels this addresses the main concerns students voiced about Vedder. All changes in Hunt and Vedder are being done with student involvement.

"We are always interested in student input and we try incorporating them when we do such a project," Remley said.

Since each wing of Vedder is wired separately for plumbing and heating, student life will not be greatly disturbed by the renovation.

The primary concern students have is the issue of noise that results from the construction.

"They have Hunt Hall under construction, which is across the way, and sometimes that could be annoying even though it isn't part of our building," Residence Hall Association Secretary/ Treasurer Katie O'Brien '06 said.

After Vedder has been fully renovated Swartz Hall is next in line, but no date has been set on this project.

"Clearly we want to continue upgrading facilities both large and small, for program opportunities as well as structural ones," Remley said.

The sisters of Chi Omega held its first "Walk for a Wish" for the Make-A-Wish Foundation on Nov. 24. The walk was held to raise the money necessary to fund a trip to Hawaii for Amanda, a Mifflinburg child suffering from leukemia.

Off-campus housing valued by students

University should focus its attention and resources on more pertinent issues

The Board of Trustees will be meeting in January to decide whether a previous resolution to move students back on campus should remain in effect. When the resolution first passed, students were involved in many downtown disturbances, such as noise violations and fighting. Many of the problems that once existed have greatly subsided since the decision to make the University completely residential was made. The Bucknellian strongly urges the Board of Trustees to reconsider this resolution and allow off-campus housing to remain permissible indefinitely.

Students living downtown appreciate the independence associated with not living in University-run housing and value having a "real-life" experience. Although it may seem trivial to some, bill-paying and maintaining a personal residence are considered invaluable to many students.

It is not simply the "adult" responsibilities that attract student to downtown living, nor is it simply the desire to party more easily. Students want the opportunity to experience all of the aspects associated with independent living, including the secondary advantages of being able to decorate with candles or cook on a George Forman Grill.

The University currently moderates off-campus living by limiting the number of students permitted to live downtown. If the administration determines that past behavior of a student renders him or her incapable of assuming the responsibilities of living downtown, they are well within their authority to reject that student's application. The real issue that the University faces is not students living off campus, rather, it is the inconsiderate students living off campus that it must regulate.

Students living off campus provide a crucial link between the University and Lewisburg. It is important for students to have the opportunity to interact with the downtown residents and expand the University community into the town community. Isolating students from the town will intensify negative town-gown relations because there will no longer be a common ground between students and residents.

Furthermore, moving students back to campus would result in many residences downtown without tenants. This would result in a financial burden both on the landlords of these building and the merchants that depend on student shoppers.

Admissions may be affected by limiting the University as an entirely residential campus. Living options are an aspect of university life that many students consider before making the decision to apply or enroll in a school, and the University may be overlooked by prospective students or labeled as a strict and intolerant institution.

Most importantly, however, is that off-campus housing is insignificant in relation to many of the other issues plaguing the University, such as budget imbalances. Purchasing land or building additional living quarters on campus is unfeasible for the University given the current state of the economy.

The administration has admitted that downtown behavior has improved significantly over the last few years, which even further indicates that this is not necessarily a "crisis" which needs to be dealt with immediately. So what are the current motives for moving all students back on campus?

The University needs to focus its attention on the more relevant on-campus issues that affect the entire student body, not just the 10 percent that elect to live in town.

University misunderstands the true meaning of diversity and free speech

By Aaron Hanlon
Staff Writer

Unless you have spent the last few months in a perpetual drunken haze, you are probably aware that free speech and true diversity are undergoing an onslaught of challenges and restrictions on college campuses across America. In case the implications of speech codes and recent events that have occurred in our own backyard have not been disturbing enough, the latest from Harvard Law School might nudge you over the edge. Given the similarities between the Harvard Law predicament and our domestic speech-code crisis, it might impetuously launch you over the edge and see you plummet into an abyss of dissatisfaction with anti-constitutional restrictions that threaten your freedom. Hopefully.

In reaction to some distasteful comments, among them a Harvard Law professor's assertion that feminism, Marxism and black studies have "contributed nothing" to tort law, Harvard's Black Law Students Association has spearheaded a campaign to institute a speech code that would ban "offensive" language from the classroom. Such a code would be drafted by the recently-formed Committee on Healthy Diversity (yes, it is actually called that). Interestingly enough, the title "Committee on Healthy Diversity" is strikingly similar to that of our "Committee for Campus Diversity."

Not only are both titles misnomers in that the actions and rhetoric of both committees have so far consistently stifled true diversity in defining "diversity" roughly as "skin color" and refusing to define "offensive" or "derogatory," the goals of these committees are nearly identical and identically insidious.

Just as the Harvard Committee on Healthy Diversity is attempting to create a speech code that would punish students and professors for using "offensive" speech by means of a "discrimination harassment policy," the University's Committee for Campus Diversity has outlined in its Campus Diversity Report that Bucknell's "bias-related harassment protocol" seeks to "eliminate derogatory remarks." The language is eerily similar.

The idea that any governing body or committee of university administrators and students could possibly create an adequate definition of "offensive" or "derogatory" regarding speech is insane.

As Harvard alumnus and current professor at American University Law School Jamin Raskin pointedly remarked, "All speech offends someone. The idea of cracking down on speech is ridiculous."

Speech is not the only casualty of the the Bucknell "diversity" crusades. True diversity, in its most apolitical sense, is being threatened by speech codes and "diversity" committees. Renowned constitutional law expert, O.J. Simpson legal defender and all-around liberal champion Alan Dershowitz (who happens also to be a professor on the Harvard Committee on Healthy Diversity) sees the mentality of the Black Law Students Association as a threat to true diversity: "When I hear blacks saying 'I want more blacks' or liberals saying 'I want more liberals' that doesn't seem like diversity—that sounds like self-serving pleading."

Supporters of the Harvard "discrimination harassment policy" have rebuked Dershowitz's comment by suggesting that not all blacks or liberals think alike, so "diversifying" Harvard Law School by intentionally admitting more students of a particular race would not necessarily result in homogeneity.

Counterintuitively, our Committee for Campus Diversity has indirectly disputed this point advocated by the Harvard Committee on Healthy Diversity: Not "thinking alike" translates to intellectual diversity; an essential criterion of diversity that has not been considered at all by the Bucknell.

Whether by coincidence or by the mores of this multiculturalist milieu, both schools can learn from each other in these trials. If the supporters of the "discrimination harassment policy" proposal could recognize the social turmoil that has resulted from the apocryphal "right to feel comfortable" and the attacks on free speech at the University, they might be inclined to reevaluate their reasoning.

Likewise, if Bucknell could recognize the broader definition of diversity that has been borne out of the Harvard dialogue, we might be able to work toward enhancement of true diversity and freedom.

Focusing on negatives highlights problems

By Phil Martoma
Senior Writer

I was once asked by another person, "What if anything, do you like about Bucknell?" It seems there is a commonly held perception that I hate everything about this school.

Also, if you have paid any attention to my articles in previous editions of The Bucknellian, you will find a certain (admitted) trend among my articles that tend to bash something if not everything about this university.

I've decided to do something different and to write instead about what it is that I like about this university.

This university has a wonderful academic reputation and does offer a wide variety of academic challenges for its students. I am also given a wide range of opportunities to meet and interact with my professors outside of the classroom.

So what, do I dislike about the University and why does it compose most of what I have to say about it?

I believe it stems from a number of little problems that compile into a larger one.

At the University, there are many cultural events where it sometimes appears with the similarities in people's clothing, race, sexual orientation, social and economic class that you can meet the exact same person over and over again.

Being a vegan, I was first confronted with the challenge of finding food to eat while I was here. The cultural homogeneity that defines this campus seemed to also apply in the area of what students will be offered to eat.

But now, after losing much weight from eating the same nutritionally deficient meal over and over again, I have come to the conclusion that I really like portabello mushroom sandwiches with a side of fries.

In fact, I particularly like having that, and only that, to choose from. Why waste time deciding between chicken and tuna melts, when you can have neither?

Still this satisfaction does not solve my problem of eating nutritionally deficient meals throughout most of the year. It also doesn't solve the problem of the cultural norm that people too rarely try to stick out of.

I like walking on an overly manicured lawn to get to the library to study for class, even knowing full well that the University is spending so much to make that walk pleasant and almost nothing to give a living wage to the person behind the counter at the Bison who made my portabello mushroom sandwich.

I have found in the past, that to dwell on the wonderful walk on the lawn would make me forget about the plight of the workers who still don't make a reasonable salary.

There are many things I like about this university that are tied with things that I don't like. I have always figured that focusing on what I don't like will probably make the problems more noticeable, and also apt to be solved.

Existence of Bucknell "bubble" suggested

By Kevin Brown
Staff Writer

In a startling revelation this past Tuesday, the Committee For At Least A Little Social Awareness (CFLALSA) released the findings of a three-year, $4 million study that concluded that there is more than apathy preventing University students from learning about events that take place in the outside world. CFLALSA deployed 12 internationally renowned scientists to the University in 1999, after a survey revealed that only 17 percent of the student body knew that Ronald Reagan was no longer president.

At a press conference on Tuesday, head scientist Dr. Matthew Werder said, "When I first arrived here, I was sure that the lack of cultural and social literacy had to do with Maxim and Cosmopolitan being the only periodicals in the library being read by students. But now, through extensive research we have determined that the hole in the ozone layer, combined with a strong magnetic field and the northern lights, keep this campus completely unaware of national and even local news." Dr. Werder then said, "Vote Reagan in 2004!"

Response from the campus varied widely, but one student, Nicole Lordan , said, "I was shocked to hear that Ronald Regan isn't president anymore, but mainly I was relieved to hear that my lack of current event knowledge is not through any fault of my own." Lordan, a senior marketing major, will graduate next semester with a perfect 4.0 grade point average.

Other students claim the results of the study to be inaccurate, citing that since the dorms are not equipped with cable in each room they are unable to stay current with news. First-year student Jeffery Maiore was quoted as saying, "If I had easy access to a television I would definitely sit down and watch 'Meet the Press' and 'The O'Reilly Factor' at least once a week." By calling Maiore's mother, one can discount his statement as pure fiction because I learned that his viewing habits at home include mostly "Alf" reruns and tapes of the canceled show "The Weakest Link."

This astonishing study, which will appear as a two-part docu-drama on NBC later this month, concludes its report by saying, "Although over 80 percent of University students knew more about current events when they had to bring in a current event each week in elementary school, it is most definitely not their fault. It is purely the exact geographical location of the school that brings this condition upon the student body."

University administration had no comment at the time this issue went to print, but our inside sources have learned that it is already in the works to have daily newspapers delivered to students doors each morning.

The only question that now remains is whether or not the papers will vaporize when they cross the barrier of the real world and enter the perfect green Utopia that is the University.

Democratic urban politics exposed in "8 Mile"

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

"8 Mile" is a good movie. It's not good because it has great actions sequences, strong character development, interesting foreshadowing, unusual manipulation of the themes or for anything else movie critics often base their opinions on.

I enjoyed it because I was expecting it to be another overdone, expensive, Hollywood production; refreshingly, it was not. Also, it brought to light a couple important issues about Democratic politics—possibly inadvertently, as director Curtis Hanson isn't exactly a card-carrying conservative.

There could have been very dramatic sequences with car chases, nauseating violence or a heart-wrenching love story; yet there were none of these things. Instead, it's a simple story about a poor white guy trying to escape the dissoluteness of the ghetto, doing so using the seemingly only talent he was born with—an ability to rap creatively and in a lyrically—smooth manner. In so doing, the story provides a keen insight into what being impoverished is all about—and it's not what you hear America's most prominent liberals harp about day-in and day-out.

Liberals will lead you to believe that a ghetto is a ghetto because it's comprised of black people, and because racism so devastatingly pervades our society, such a dense population of black people inevitably creates these imploding destitute heighborhoods.

White people live in ghettos too, and racism isn't the cause of their poverty. Marshall Mathers, a.k.a. Eminem—playing the role of Jimmy Smith, or Bunny Rabbit in "8 Mile"—portrays the white ghetto dweller.

Detroit is an archetypal solidification of what 30 years of Democratic urban politics actually does to a city. 8 Mile Road runs along the entire northern boundary of Detroit, separating urban and suburban, dangerous areas and safe streets.

8 Mile Road is actually the figurative division line that's depicted in the movie—on one side, there is the black neighborhood, and on the other, the masses that have made the exodus, escaping an innercity system that doesn't work.

> Eminem fulfilled the American Dream—he escaped the destitution of the ghetto, utilizing the talents he was blessed with to make a better life for himself and for his family.

To walk from the outside towards the inside, the scenery dramatically changes from a functioning community to a dreary district noticeably void of any hope. When asked to explain this startling division line, Detroit congressman John Conyers bluntly answers, "Racism."

"But the white/black divide of Eight Mile is really a myth—a convenient crutch," writes Henry Payne in The Detroit News. "Southfield, the prosperous suburb immediately northwest of Detroit is 54 percent African American. Dearborn is 30 percent Arab. Detroit's bordering townships are racial melting pots of Arabs, Poles, blacks and Jews, hardly the WASPish communities Conyers' remark would lead you to believe."

New businesses are rarely started in innercity Detroit; the tax rates are high and riots provide a risk that the police are unable to effectively combat. A generation of welfare addicts has become increasingly insidious. The workforce has an unbelievable 47 percent illiteracy rate. There is only one movie theatre, the Phoenix, on 8 Mile Road (where someone was shot on the opening night viewing of the movie). There is not one large retail store—no Wal-Mart, Sears or anything. Seventy percent of children are born into single-parent households.

No Detroit public officials attended the film's premier at The Phoenix because they felt the film overly bastardized the depraved scenery of Detroit. These politicians would rather not talk about the policies that have ravaged their city, instead seeking to merely "look ahead" with continued bad strategy.

Eminem shows that bad politics doesn't infect in accordance with race. Democratic aims of artificial alleviation impair urbanites of all skin colors. The other rappers he challenges in the freestyle battles also think that race is more important than class. They call him "Elvis," "honkey," "a Nazi" and other slurs to infer that the world of hip-hop is no place for a white boy. There are references to the KKK, Vanilla Ice, Willie Nelson and just about everything else that drives home the point that he is white and they are black.

Thankfully, Eminem lets us know that race does not matter. He is a fellow resident in the ghetto, regardless of the shade of his skin. He knows what its like to be poor, and he knows how to rap.

In his final battle, after incurring the massive onslaught of racial demagoguery, he retorts back against the other finalist.

He says playfully, "But I know something about/you went to Clairebrook, that's a private school."

He goes on to challenge his opponent's ghetto credentials, "What's the matter dogg, you embarrassed?/This guy's a gangsta?/You're real name's Clarence/And Clarence lives at home with both parents/And Clarence's parents have a real good marriage."

Eminem knows that living in the slums of Detroit is about being poor, usually coming from a broken home and not necessarily black—"I'm a piece of white trash/I say it proudly."

And so Eminem fulfilled the American Dream—he escaped the destitution of the ghetto, utilizing the talents he was blessed with to make a better life for himself and for his family.

Now if only Detroit's political leadership could pick up on that strategy.

Kissinger will conduct corrupt 9/11 "investigation"

By Tim Hinkle
Staff Writer

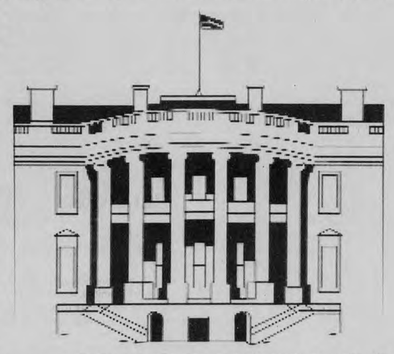
The lack of respect our government and particularly the Bush administration has, for the American people, become even more clear this week with the appointment of Henry Kissinger as a special independent counsel to investigate the attacks of Sept. 11.

Who could be better to hide the facts and obscure the truth of what really happened leading up to and on that dreadful September day than the man who is responsible for so many of the foreign policy decisions that have led to our current problems with terrorism. The Bush administration knows it can trust Kissinger to keep the truth from the American people, and that is precisely what he will do.

There are many unanswered questions about Sept. 11 that the Bush administration is not exactly rushing to shed light on. After all, up until this week, the Bush administration has opposed any kind of investigation into the intelligence and logistical failures that allowed Sept. 11 to happen. Even now, the Kissinger commission is not even to investigate the government failures that allowed 9/11 to happen, but rather to "help the administration learn the tactics and motives of the enemy."

Why have we not learned what the president was told during his briefings in August 2001 about al-Qaida threats, or why investigations into the terrorists who perpetuated them were terminated? Why have we not learned why standard FAA and military operating procedures to have fighter jets intercept a hijacked plane within twelve minutes of deviation from original course? Why did our government ignore the intelligence reports coming in from all over the globe which detailed the terrorists' plans? Rest easy America, because these answers will certainly not be included in the Kissinger report, as the Bush administration has ensured.

Many people are not aware of Henry Kissinger's dirty and bloody past. Kissinger was responsible for keeping the Vietnam War going on long after he knew it could not be won.



Kissinger can also claim credit for the illegal bombings of Cambodia during the Vietnam War.

Most people do not know that on Sept. 10, 2001, only a day before the terrorist attacks took place, Kissinger was hit with a lawsuit by the survivors of Chile's General Rene Schneider in 1973, whose murder Kissinger ordered, according to recently declassified Pentagon papers. Schneider's murder led to the bloody overthrow of the democratically elected government of Salvador Allende and the brutal torture and murder of over 30,000 innocent Chileans during the reign of dictator Augusto Pinochet.

Kissinger's actions as secretary of state led to the destabilization and overthrow of countless democratically elected governments around the world. Kissinger's laundry list of foreign policy achievements includes the deaths of up to one million Indonesians after the U.S.-backed overthrow of President Sukarno in 1965 and the establishment of the Khmer Rouge and the resulting murder of over two million Cambodians.

So not only does Kissinger have his own dirty and bloody past to hide, but he clearly already has ties with the Bush administration. How, you ask? Well, during the Ford administration, Kissinger stayed on as Ford's Secretary of State after Nixon resigned.

What connection does this have to the current Bush administration you ask? Well let's look at the rest of Ford's cabinet. His chief of staff was Dick Cheney and his secretary of defense was Donald Rumsfeld. Not only that, but Ford appointed none other than George Herbert Walker Bush to be the Director of the CIA. Clearly, Kissinger has no interest in shedding light on any possible coverups involving his old White House buddies.

The Bush administration scored a masterful stroke against decency and truth when it secured Henry Kissinger as the head of the independent counsel to "investigate" 9/11. After delaying any kind of investigation into the attack on America for over 15 months, the Bush administration had to bow to the demands of the families of Sept. 11, numerous congressional lawmakers and the American people for an in-depth investigation into the events leading up to Sept. 11, 2001. Unfortunately, we can be sure that the truth will never be known thanks to this cynical and calculated appointment.

Wake up America, and demand from your congressional representatives a real investigation into Sept. 11 before lies and coverups are used to further the Bush administration's shameless war on truth and freedom.

"Conservative cynicism" dominates tax policy of Bush administration

By Mike Niebauer
Senior Writer

Since the days of the Reagan White House conservatives have always operated with a cynical political view. Reagan would say that government was not the solution but the problem for Americans. They spin the opinion that negative political advertising and promoting a healthy government is the key to becoming the majority party. The current president had to sell himself as the "compassionate conservative" to get elected. Now that U.S. President George W. Bush has the perception of a conservative midterm election mandate his politics and tax policies are illustrating the same conservative cynicism.

Paul Krugman in a New York Times (NYT) column apologizes that he once said that the conservative economic program was simply tax cut, and more tax cuts mostly for the already well off and corporations. Krugman admits he was in error. Emboldened conservatives now advocate tax increases ... but only tax increases for people with low incomes.

> Now that U.S. President George W. Bush has the perception of a conservative midterm election mandate his politics and tax policies are illustrating the same conservative cynicism.

The Wall Street Journal (WSJ) editors seem to be miffed that poor people pay too little in income taxes. The WSJ mostly conservative editors "feel the cynicism" and have a healthy fear that these poor workers may not have a healthy hatred toward the cancer that is government services.

The WSJ seems to be terrified that future tax cuts might include tax concessions to ordinary families. These "compassionate conservatives" want to ensure that any tax cuts go to corporations and the wealthy.

The WSJ editors cynical theory sadly goes like this: Poorer workers must maintain a disdain (better yet loathing) toward government in a general sense. They must feel that the taxes they pay are squandered in wasteful programs and fraudulent practices, and only their version of pure capitalism is their only salvation. The WSJ editors feel that federal tax policy must be nasty to people with low incomes, lest they have any good feelings about government. Some of the things that have been coming out lately make sense considering this view.

Keeping with this theory that some workers that don't pay their way and are unemployed will get a stiff dose of this "compassionate cynicism" for Christmas. House Republicans recently refused to extend unemployment insurance for the long-term displaced workers suffering out the current economic downturn. Their actions or lack of it will guarantee that later this month 800,000 workers will get letters from the government informing them that their benefits are cut off. The theory goes that this painful outcome helps conservatives to promote frustration and hatred toward government. What better way than to deprive working class children of a decent Christmas.

Another tactic is to underfund and starve government programs that are known to be effective for the working poor. Congress has failed to provide adequate funds for the State Children's Health Insurance Fund Program (CHIPS). Conservatives have no interest in maintaining enough funding for this highly successful program. The sums were small by Washington standards, but the theory is the thing here. The results of these actions are dramatic. The Office of Management and Budget estimates, 900,000 children will lose health insurance over the next three years. In this era of "personal responsibility" any child that chooses to have parents who cannot afford health care must accept the consequences of their actions.

> The Office of Management and Budget estimates, 900,000 children will lose health insurance over the next three years. In this era of "personal responsibility" any child that chooses to have parents who cannot afford health care must accept the consequences of their actions.

The political slogan "Leave No Child Behind" rings sadly hollow as it has been implemented by the conservatives now so triumphantly emboldened. As the theory goes, the government must never do anything that can be understood as positive. Government must be envisioned as a negative entity not to be trusted. Reagan would be so proud of the Bush-conservative maneuvers.

And now for a nice helping of holiday hypocrisy from the White House. The Bush administration has decided to restore cash bonuses to political appointees. Clinton ended this practice during both terms, but in the spirit of keeping good people in these appointed positions, they feel bonuses are necessary. The policy change is being implemented in many federal departments.

A Washington Post article shows, "For the first time Cabinet-level officials and agency chiefs have been authorized to approve annual awards of up to $10,000 and possibly more for influential senior attorneys, policy advisers, confidential assistants and other appointees brought on to political staffs. Awards can total $25,000 or higher with approval from the White House. These senior political appointees typically earn $115,000 to $140,000 a year."

Chief of Staff Andrew Card stated, "Political appointees should be judged and rewarded in the same manner as career employees." Bush aides said, "the White House policy shift reflects the administration's emphasis on a results-oriented government," rewarding excellence and productivity by all federal employees. At a time when these appointees receive their appointments because of their fundraising activities or giving large personal contributions to the Republican Party apparatus or general campaign strategy expertise, the hypocrisy must be highlighted.

The "compassionate conservative" cynical theory works for political appointees but works against the unemployed and their children. If this is "results oriented government," the Bush administration hopes the next two years will provide many issues for its political opponents to work toward "regime change" in Washington.

A gift for the economy this holiday season

On the day following Thanksgiving, Wal-Mart recorded earnings of $1.43 billion. Experts say that holiday shopping this year may contribute to improvements in the economy.

BY JIM LEAHY
Senior Writer

Attention holiday shoppers—you may be helping the economy much more than you ever dreamed of by laying out cash, writing checks or swiping those credit cards at your local retailer this holiday season. With the passage of "Black Friday," the day retailers hope will ensure that their year will end in the black, retailers are looking strong and that strength may signal a rebound for the lagging U.S. economy.

The day after Thanksgiving, Wal-Mart, the world's largest retailer, announced that it achieved a one-day sales record, besting its old mark by over 14 percent.

"Wal-Mart said it racked up $1.43 billion in sales on Friday at its U.S. stores. That compares to sales of $1.25 billion last year," The New York Times reported.

Wal-Mart was not the only retailer showing renewed strength over the beginning of the holiday shopping season. The Wall Street Journal reported that computer manufacturers are seeing signs that their business will be strong this holiday season.

"Overall we more than exceeded expectations, particularly in the photo-smart and all-in-one product categories," said Bill DeLacy, vice president of U.S. consumer sales for Hewlett-Packard. Hewlett-Packard reported sales that were higher by as much as 200 percent over last year.

Apple Computer reported that it saw its busiest week ever at its retail stores and, according to The Wall Street Journal, Best Buy spokeswoman Lisa Hawks "agreed that popular products continue to be DVD players, digital televisions, digital cameras and camcorders. She said that accessories that surround the PC were also in high demand." The company's stores opened their doors on Friday at 6 a.m. and "saw lines of anywhere from 75 to 1,000 people waiting to capitalize on the early-morning specials."

Online retailers are also reporting strong sales as the holiday shopping season begins. MSNBC.com reports that total sales for Dec. 2 were up 49 percent over the same day last year, totaling $380 million. Dec. 2, or the first Monday after Thanksgiving, is typically the heaviest online shopping day because many consumers shop at work on a faster Internet connection. Last Christmas season, online shopping peaked during working hours from noon to 3 p.m. EST.

Despite all the talk of happy returns for the economy this holiday season, many analysts are not painting a very rosy picture. The Washington Post reported, "Sales compared to last year grew an impressive 4 percent last week. However, around this time last year, the nation was still shell-shocked following the Sept. 11 attacks."

"Consumer spending has been relatively choppy, and I'm not sure we've really changed anything on that front,' said Mike Niemira, a senior economist at Bank of Tokyo-Mitsubishi, according to The Washington Post. "We're looking for slightly better results than the last couple of years, but the last couple of years have been a relatively dismal performance."

In addition, auto sales fell dramatically in November and opened up new concerns on the strength of that industry. The New York Times reported that sales at Ford declined 20 percent in November from a year ago, and the company announced that it would be cutting production. General Motors saw an 18 percent decline in sales as the entire industry saw a 12.7 percent drop. Chrysler's sales fell 15 percent, while its Mercedes unit rose 7.5 percent.

Among other carmakers, November sales at BMW rose 25 percent from November of last year and are up 18 percent for the first 11 months of this year compared with the period last year. Honda sales rose 4.6 percent for November. Toyota sales fell 5.2 percent, but the company has gained more than half a percentage point of market share in the United States this year.

Nevertheless, the good news outweighs much of the bad. On Wednesday, The Wall Street Journal reported some strong economic data that may signal some gains in the economy. Productivity rose at a brisk 5.1 percent annual rate, the Labor Department reported Wednesday. That reading was even better than the impressive 4 percent growth rate previously estimated for the July-through-August period and represented a considerable pickup from the 1.7 percent pace registered in the second quarter.

In addition, factory orders rose 1.5 percent in October after falling the two previous months, said the Commerce Department. The Institute for Supply Management said its index of non-manufacturing activity jumped to 57.4 in November from 53.1 the previous month. That was much stronger than the 53.5 economists were expecting. A reading above 50 indicates expansion in the sector.

The coming year could be a good one for the U.S. economy, as signs are showing some developing strength. The holiday shopping season will certainly be a big signal of the growth in the economy and it will also show how tightly Americans are holding onto their money. If early signs prove to be right, this will be a good holiday season and more gifts will be underneath the Christmas tree.

Massachusetts Senator John Kerry speaks to the City Club of Cleveland. An opponent of Al Gore, Kerry could be a strong candidate for the Democratic party in the upcoming presidential election.

Sen. Kerry on the path to presidential candidacy

BY MICHAEL DUDZINSKI
Staff Writer

As voters await former Vice President Al Gore's decision about a second run at the presidency, another Washington politician has confirmed his own bid for the Democratic primary. Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., announced Sunday that he has begun to fill out paperwork confirming his candidacy. The Associated Press (AP) reported that an official announcement from Kerry is not expected anytime soon.

A staunch liberal, Kerry is in the midst of his fourth term as a Massachusetts senator. This well-known politician has been seriously considering a run for the presidency for some time. A Los Angeles Times poll revealed that voters chose Gore and Kerry as their top choices for the Democratic nomination. A man of extreme wealth and power, Kerry may pose a tough challenge for Gore during the primaries.

Before his tenure as senator, Kerry served in the Vietnam War and as a special prosecutor afterward, according to the AP. A graduate of Yale and an initiate of the elite "Skull & Bones" secret society, Kerry has gone through the same prepping stages as President George W. Bush.

CNN pointed out that Sen. Evan Bayh, D-Ind., called Kerry a "very able man," but expressed uncertainty as to whether he is the best Democratic candidate to take on Bush. Kerry opposes many of Bush's economic and domestic policies, which may be a risky choice for the Democrats who seek to oust a popular president in the next election.

Another challenge facing Kerry is his seemingly rigid personality. The Washington Post asserted that such behavior was overwhelmingly evident in Kerry's Sunday appearance on NBC's "Meet the Press." Without a doubt, much of the public cited a "warmth problem" that may hamper the "articulate and experienced" senator during the presidential race. The Washington Post also stated that Kerry's "super-serious demeanor" rarely gives way to even a half-smile. With a recent emphasis on character as a prime determinant of the victor, Kerry's personality will be weighed highly during the 2004 election.

Middle-class voters have expressed concern that Kerry may not be entirely in touch with their constituency due to the fact that he is the wealthiest man in the Senate. The AP said that Democratic voters find it odd that a billionaire politician would advocate large tax cuts for the wealthy. With the economy a main concern, voters might not want to bet on a Democratic candidate who may prove to be a "George Bush in disguise."

Kerry has proclaimed a tough stance on corporate abuse and environmental preservation. The AP reported that Kerry uncovered the fraudulent activity within the Bank of Credit and Commerce International, which was eventually shut down for transferring terrorist organizations' funds. In 1995, his efforts helped block a Republican proposal to loosen air and water regulation. Last year, Kerry objected to the Republican effort to commence oil drilling in the Artic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska.

Although the political tide may currently be against Kerry, prospects for the future are still bright. Before winning the presidency in 1960, John F. Kennedy was widely regarded as an inept public communicator. With practice, he was soon able to win over the hearts of most Americans through his fervent speeches. A little practice may be all that Kerry needs to win the White House in 2004.

Runoff election in Louisiana for Senate will prove to be pivotal for both political parties

BY LINDSEY GENTEL
Staff Writer

Sen. Mary Landrieu had to know there was going to be trouble when she saw torrential rain sweep into New Orleans on Nov. 5. If you are a Democratic candidate in Louisiana, rain can be a disaster. Since a disproportionate number of black voters, who are important supporters of the Democrats, get around by bus or foot, it is less likely they are going to be at the polls.

Since Landrieu did not draw 50 percent of the vote against a field of eight opponents on Nov. 5, under Louisiana's election laws, she must compete in a runoff for re-election on Dec. 7. She received 46 percent of the votes, and a state rule requires a runoff between the top two finishers if one candidate does not win a majority. She faces Republican Suzanne Terrell, who finished second.

It seems that Landrieu is facing a bigger problem than torrential rain. The Republicans cleverly ran three well-known candidates from different parts of the state, which together were able to take 51 percent of the vote. Landrieu faces not only Terrell, who is the state elections commissioner, but also the force of a nationally mounting Republican Party that is not distracted by other Senate races.

Mary Landrieu seeks to retain her position as Democratic senator for Louisiana. A runoff election will be held on Dec. 7.

This election will decide whether the Republicans have a one-seat or two-seat majority in the Senate. It may also mark the overthrow of the Democrats from one of their last southern strongholds.

With the post-election breakdown in the Senate at 51 Republicans, 48 Democrats (including Landrieu) and one independent, cash is pouring into Louisiana from both parties. Vice President Dick Cheney campaigned with Terrell last week. Former President George Bush was in Louisiana on Monday and President George W. Bush was in the state on Tuesday. National operatives and media figures are overflowing the French Quarter.

Landrieu is a moderate Democrat who could attain immediate cachet by challenging the GOP's national momentum and beating Terrell on Dec. 7.

The Republican strategy in the campaign is to show how close Terrell is to Bush. Interestingly, the Democrats' approach is pretty much the same. Despite the new tough talk from the party's presidential wannabes, the Democrats' best strategy is to narrow the gap with Bush.

Landrieu, running for a second term, boasts the fact that she has voted with the president a bountiful 75 percent of the time. By that standard, she could have a problem because Terrell said she will vote for Bush 100 percent of the time. Regardless of numbers, these actions emphasize that in this race, Bush cannot lose.

With the Senate already comfortably Republican, it is easy to think this race is no big deal, but that perception is wrong. Although Bush warned Republicans not to exult in their takeover of the Senate, he did not say anything about not rubbing it in with one more win. According to CNN.com, Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., the GOP campaign chairman, refers to the contest as "war." He is pouring as much as $10 million into the state to help Terrell, who had been relatively unknown until Election Day, when she finished ahead of the early favorite, Rep. John Cooksey, R-La. The national party abandoned him after he described a Muslim as wearing "a diaper on his head."

Landrieu's stance on supporting Bush and her similarities to Terrell can cut two ways. Some voters may see reason to replace the incumbent. Landrieu can hardly depict Terrell as an extremist, a tactic that helped her win in 1996. In the primary, Landrieu boasted of voting with Bush 75 percent of the time.

Terrell is for shrinking the government (she even voted to eliminate her own job), and favors making Bush's tax cut permanent, even rolling back the tax on wealthy Social Security recipients.

Courtesy of Reuters

Challenger Suzanne Terrell seeks to gain a seat in the Senate. If Terrell wins, she will contribute to the Republican majority in the Senate.

There are solid disagreements between Landrieu and Terrell, the most substantial of which is over abortion.

According to MSNBC.com, in a televised debate last weekend, Terrell declared, "I am 100 percent pro-life. As a practicing Catholic, I did not leave my faith as did Mary Landrieu."

In southern Louisiana, few insults sting more, or presume more, than calling someone a bad Catholic. Landrieu, who supports most forms of abortion, denied a loss of faith and accused Terrell of inconsistency because she was listed as honorary co-chairman of a 1994 Planned Parenthood event. Terrell insists that was a mistake.

Social conservatives still think Terrell is more pro-life than Landrieu. Even so, internal strife on the right continues. The Republican Louisiana governor, Mike Foster, criticized the negative tone of his own party's positions in regards to the race, but still endorsed Terrell. Cooksey, who finished third in the primary, has accused Terrell of running a "smear campaign" against him.

Whatever the divisions among Republicans in Louisiana, the national Republican machine is solidly trying to win the seat.

Landrieu's problems reflect those of the Democrats in general. When asked if she will invite former Vice President Al Gore or former President Bill Clinton to campaign for her, she dodges the question. She has already collected the biggest bonus the national Democrats can offer her, which is an assurance from the Senate Democratic leader, Tom Daschle, D-S.D., that she will keep her seat on the Senate Appropriations Committee if she is re-elected (though the Republicans may try to block this).

Since the Democrats' loss last month, she has offered ideas that appeal to both the lower and the middle classes, such as a plan to exempt the first $10,000 of workers' salaries from the federal payroll tax.

A poll this week gave Landrieu a 16-point lead. Many experts still think the odds are against her. Although the Democrats have held the seat for 119 years, Louisiana, like so much of the South, seems to be slipping out of their hands. Bush carried the state by 8 percentage points (and by 46 points among white voters) in the 2000 presidential election. Republicans control most of the statewide offices. Unlike the dejected Democrats, they are full of confidence.

Terrell could win just by getting everyone who voted for her party in November to return to the polls.

Landrieu has to get Democrats out, particularly black Democrats, who did not show up on Election Day. Her supporters have been handing out leaflets in black neighborhoods and visiting black churches to urge members to vote. A few prominent black leaders who declined to support her in the primary have finally come around. Landrieu may still make it. Even if she wins, the Democrats need a better line of attack in Louisiana than fighting over one group of voters and praying for a sunny day.

Bison fall to 2-3 after loss to Canisius

Bucknell dropped its first home contest of the season on Tuesday to Canisius by the count of 71-67 at David Gymnasium. The Orange and Blue fell to 2-3 overall following the loss.

The Bison trailed 14-2 early. It was the outside shooting touch of Matthew Quinn '04, who netted a career-high 22 points and was five-for-six from downtown in the first half, that brought the team back into contention. He felt fortunate to be the one who was able to rejuvenate the squad in its first appearance in front of the home crowd.

"Although Boakai is our go-to guy, any one of us is capable of providing the team offense. There have been a number of times when I did not shoot the ball well and my teammates picked me up," Quinn said. "I was happy to return the favor against Canisius. My production, both shootingwise and in other facets of the game, opens things up for our two horses inside, Brian and B.T. (Boakai Lalugba '03)."

Despite Quinn's precision from the field, Canisius had a hot-hand of its own in Hodari Mallory. He was five-for-six from three-land in the first half as well, and finished with a game-high 26 points.

"He was feeling it tonight," Quinn said. "It is unfortunate that it happened against us, but we also could have done a better job getting a hand up on him and locating him on defense."

The lead changed eight times in the first half of play and concluded with a thunderous dunk by Lalugba, who had

The Bison volleyball squad finished its season with a 3-0 loss to Lehigh on Friday, Nov. 22. The Bison fell to 2nd-seeded Lehigh in the semifinals of the Patriot League Tournament. After an impressive 2002 season, the Orange and Blue finished off the year with a respectable 15-13 overall record and a 9-5 Patriot League record.

Bucknell has struggled all year to defeat Lehigh, falling 3-1 the other two times they faced them in the regular season. The Bison came into the match with high hopes of defeating Lehigh for the first time this season, but wound up being disappointed, losing in three straight matches.

"The last time we played them their outside hitters played really well," Brandi Trapasso '04 said. "We had to stop their outside if we were going to beat them, and we needed to play better defense."

The Bison led the first game for the first 13 points, but eventually fell 30-24. Bucknell came back strong in the second game but fell short, losing 30-27. In the third and final game, the Mountain Hawks finished off the Bison's season with a 30-24 victory.

"We really didn't play well as a team. It just wasn't our day," Brandi Trapasso said. "As individuals and as a team, we couldn't play like we wanted to. Nothing was working the way we wanted it to."

Jennifer Wrigley '03 led the team in hitting with an impressive .417 average and tallying 11 digs. Melanie Ghiz '03 led the team with 12 kills and had a respectable .258 hitting percentage. Breean Trapasso '04 shared the team-high 14 digs and added 28 assists in the Bison effort. Chelsea Anderson '06 also had a team-high 14 digs. Brandi Trapasso added 10 kills and 12 digs to the Bison effort, while Chelsea Robertson '05 added 12 digs as well.

Melanie Ghiz '03 pounds the ball into enemy territory during an earlier contest this season. Ghiz led the team with 12 kills in last Friday's game.

After coming so far this season and placing 3rd in the Patriot League, the Bison were a little disappointed with the level of play in their final game of the season.

"We hoped that we would play our best in our last game, and instead we played badly. We were all really kind of surprised at the loss and disappointed that we didn't fight at the end," Brandi Trapasso said. "We felt that we did not show the way Bucknell volleyball should be played."

With the 2002 season barely in the record books, the Lady Bison are already looking towards the future and their upcoming season.

"We are really ready for next year. I am looking forward to the training and preseason for next year," Brandi Trapasso said. "I really want to come out next year and win the Patriot League. I had a lot of fun this season and really showed that we could compete with anyone. Next year we our goal is to win the Patriot League playoffs."

Bison football looks to future

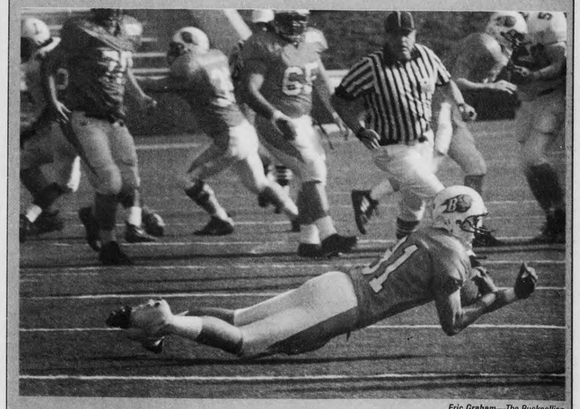
The Bucknell football team ended its 2002 season on Saturday, Nov. 23 with a 34-7 loss to the Patriot League champion Fordham University Rams. The Bison finished the season with a 2-9 record, and now try to take anything positive from this season that they can, hoping to turn things around for next year's campaign.



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Jim Horan '03 makes a diving catch during an earlier game against Lafayette. Horan and the Bison closed out a disappointing season on Nov. 23 with a loss to PL champions Fordham, their seventh straight loss.

The Rams got on top early in the game. Fordham took the ball 74 yards down the field on the first possession of the game, and capped off the eight-play scoring drive with a 1-yard touchdown run. Adam Lord '03 blocked the extra point attempt to keep the score at 6-0 early in the first quarter.

The Bison looked as though they were going to come out with a different offensive attitude than in past weeks. Daris Wilson '05 started at quarterback, and connected with Albert Marquardt '04 on a 35-yard pass on Bucknell's first offensive play from scrimmage. Three plays later Wilson fumbled the ball and Fordham recovered.

While the Bison defense continued to play tough, as they have all season long, the Bison went on to lose two more fumbles in the first quarter. Following their second fumble, the Bison gave the ball to the Rams at the Bucknell 16-yard line. Three plays later the Rams ran the ball in from 2 yards out to make the score 13-0 at the end of the first quarter.

After recovering the third Bucknell fumble in the waning seconds of the first quarter, the Rams took the ball 69 yards on six plays, and scored on a 9-yard touchdown pass to make the score 20-0 early in the second quarter.

"You talk about turnovers, penalties and mistakes, these are the heart and soul of our problem. This will definitely be a major theme for the future," Head Coach Dave Kotulski said.

> "The only way to achieve success in the future is through incredibly hard work."
> —Head Coach David Kotulski

While the Bison offense continued to struggle to put together a drive, the Rams were moving the ball well again at the end of the first half. After getting good field position, Fordham put together a 10-play, 44-yard scoring drive, that was capped off by an 8-yard touchdown pass to put the Bison behind 27-0 at halftime.

The Bison were forced to punt the ball after going three and out on the first possession of the second half. Fordham fielded the punt, and returned it 62 yards for a touchdown to make the score 34-0 early in the third quarter.

Bison name new head coach

Tim Landis from St. Mary's takes over for football team

By Brent Butler
Sports Editor

Anyone looking over the Patriot League football statistics will see that the Bucknell football team desperately needs a change. After a 2-9 season in which they lost their last seven games in a row, the Bison are sorely in need of a drastic change that will change the future of this team.

The administration hopes it has made this change with the hiring of Tim Landis. On Tuesday, Bucknell University director of athletics and recreation John Hardt announced the successful completion of a national search with the selection of Landis, a 10-year veteran of the collegiate coaching, as Bucknell's next Bob Odell Head Football Coach.

Landis was hired Tuesday night as Bucknell's head coach beginning in the 2003 season. He replaces Dave Kotulski, who was the defensive coordinator for seven years before becoming the acting head coach in 2002 when Head Coach Tom Gadd's cancer prevented him from being on the sidelines.

Tim Landis will take over as Bob Odell Head Football Coach. Landis has ten years of coaching experience, including three years with St. Mary's College in California.

Landis, 38, has much experience coaching at the Division I-AA level. He becomes Bucknell's 25th head football coach since the program's inception in 1883.

"I have worked a very long time in this profession to earn a tremendous opportunity such as this," Landis said. "To coach at a quality educational institution like Bucknell, that also has a long and proud history of football, is the culmination of a lifelong dream of mine."

The rest of the Bucknell coaching staff, which had six first-year coaches in 2002, will be named at a later date.

"Not only has Tim Landis shown that he is an outstanding football coach, but he has achieved an impressive track record of recruiting and developing student-athletes at highly selective academic institutions," Hardt said. "Bucknell places great emphasis on developing the highest caliber student-athletes, both on and off the playing field, and we believe that Coach Landis is a perfect fit to lead our football program and successfully build on our established traditions."

After seven years as the head coach at Davidson College, Landis has spent the last three seasons at St. Mary's College in California. At both schools he helped turn modestly successful programs into winning programs. In the prior two seasons before he arrived at St Mary's, the Gaels had been just 4-17 for the two years. Landis turned the team around into a respectable 6-5 overall record in the first year he was there; this marked the program's best one-year turnaround since football was reinstated at St. Mary's in 1967.

In 2001 the Gaels finished 6-5, and Landis was awarded the Division I-AA Independent Coach of the Year. Landis, who has a career head coaching record of 53-52-1, is very familiar with Bucknell and the Patriot League, having coached against Patriot League teams at both Davidson and St. Mary's.

A native of Yardley, Pa., Landis went on to earn a BA in English from Randolph-Macon College in 1986. He was a First Team All-Old Dominion Athletic Conference honoree both as a quarterback in football and a pitcher in baseball, Landis was inducted into the Randolph-Macon Athletic Hall of Fame in 2000. He was the ODAC Baseball Player of the Year in 1986, and he also earned the school's Compton Award for excellence in academics and athletics.

Landis began coaching in 1986, when he remained at Randolph-Macon to coach his alma mater's wide receivers. In 1988, he became head football and baseball coach at Morrisville (Pa.) High School, where he led the team to an 8-2 record, a state ranking and was awarded the Coach of the Year by the Bucks County Courier Times, the Bicentennial Athletic League and the Independence Football League.

Landis returned to the collegiate level in 1991, when he was hired as an assistant at Davidson.

"Having so many roots in the East, I have followed the Patriot League for a long time and it is becoming one of the premier conferences in Division I-AA football," Landis said. "Just look at the success that Patriot League teams have had in the I-AA playoffs. Every school in the league has academic prestige and football prestige. That is a great combination."

After recording seven straight winning seasons from 1995-2001, including a Patriot League championship in 1996, Bucknell slipped to 2-9 in 2002. Even with the disappointing 2002 season, the Bison led the Patriot League in total defense and is expected to return 14 starters in 2003.

Landis succeeds Kotulski who replaced Tom Gadd, one of his good friends who won a school-record 48 games in seven seasons before brain cancer forced him to become a spectator this year.

Hardt announced last month that the Bison football job was being opened, a plan Kotulski said was agreed to in July when he was named acting coach.

Women's basketball battles its way to the .500 mark

With their win over Loyola the Bison have battled back to .500

The women's basketball team battled its way back to the .500 mark last Tuesday, as the Bison outlasted Loyola in an intense 76-73 road victory. The Orange and Blue held the lead throughout the entire game, but had to hold off several charges from the Greyhounds.

The Bison had a healthy 65-52 lead with 8 minutes, 34 seconds left in the game, but Loyola rallied to get within 4 points with under 5 minutes remaining. Molly Creamer '03 quickly opened the Bison advantage back up to 7 points with her three-pointer, but the Greyhounds retaliated once again, this time with two turnovers to scrape within 3 points.

With 54 seconds left on the clock, Loyola had crept within a point of the Bison, and the score stood at 74-73. The Bison held on gamely and did not allow the Greyhounds to capitalize on an offensive rebound and an out-of-bounds ball in their favor, and with two seconds remaining, Creamer sunk two foul-shots to pad the eventual final score at 76-73.

Continuing where she left off last year, Creamer collected her third 30-point game of the season with a 32-point effort. She has been named Patriot League Player of the Week for two consecutive weeks, including the week ending Dec. 1. She leads the conference in points-per-game (25.8) and assists-per-game (7.8).

Also putting up double digits were Desire Almind '04 with 23 points and Kate Franks '03 with 12 points.

The Bison hit 48.1 percent of their shots, including a 50 percent clip for the second half. The victory marked the team's third straight win after a slow start.

Over Thanksgiving break, the Orange and Blue defeated Canisius and Drexel on Nov. 27 and Nov. 29, respectively. In the final home game of the semester, the Bison handily defeated Drexel 95-83, as they shot at a 59.2 percent clip and never allowed the Dragons to take the lead.

Molly Creamer '03 dodges around a defender in a previous game. Creamer scored 32 points against Loyola on Tuesday.

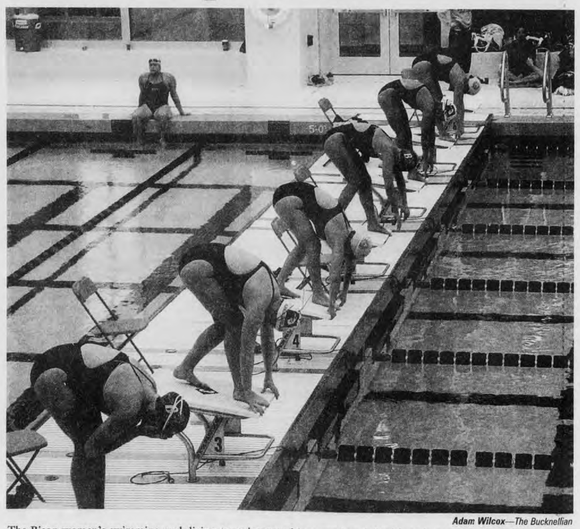
Creamer led the team with 23 points, and was one of four players to reach double figures. Franks was close behind with 20 points, Jennie Ruth '06 scored a career-high 19 points and Almind finished with 14 points and a team-leading nine rebounds. The performance contributed to Ruth being named Patriot League Rookie of the Week for the week ending Dec. 1.

The victory followed a winning performance by the Bison against Canisius just two days earlier. The Orange and Blue out-scored the Golden Griffs 100-91 en route to their first win of the season. It was the University's first 100-point game since 1996.

Creamer had an impressive game, scoring 31 points and amassing nine assists and four steals. Franks scored a career-high 28 points and seven assists, in addition to coming within one three-pointer of tying the single-game school record for that statistic, which still stands at eight. Almind reached double digits in rebounds, with 10, and in points, netting 22.

The team looks to push their record over the .500 mark when they travel to Delaware tomorrow.

Women improve to 4-0 overall



Adam Wilcox—The Bucknellian

The Bison women's swimming and diving team improved its record to 4-0 with a victory over Army last Saturday. The men's squad struggled against the Black Knights, falling 164-79 and dropping its record to 1-2.

On Saturday, Nov 23, Bucknell hosted Patriot League foe Army. The women came out on top over the Black Knights, 141-100, but the men were unable to defeat Army, falling 164-79. The women swimming and diving team has improved its record to 4-0 for the 2002-03 season, while the men have dropped to 1-2.

"We were confident going into the meet, but we still knew that we had to swim well in order to beat them," Lectie Altman '06 said. "They are a good team, and we knew that we had to swim hard or they were going to come back and beat us."

In the women's events, Bucknell captured a number of impressive first place finishes throughout the meet. In the women's 400-medley relay, Altman, Jamie Flick '05, Mary Krakowski '06, and Lynne Ashenfelter '04 placed first with a time of four minutes 1.28 seconds. The score was good enough to place them 10th on the All-Time list, and with two first-year students and one sophomore on the medley squad, the future looks bright for the Bison swimming team.

"We weren't trying to beat the record; it just happened that we came close," Altman said. "It would be nice if we beat it, but that is not our goal when we go out and swim. If it happens, that's great, but we are not going to worry about it."

Daniela Faas '04 captured first place in the 1,000-yard free with a time of 10:35.80. Altman scored first-place points with an impressive time of 1:56.27 in the 200-yard

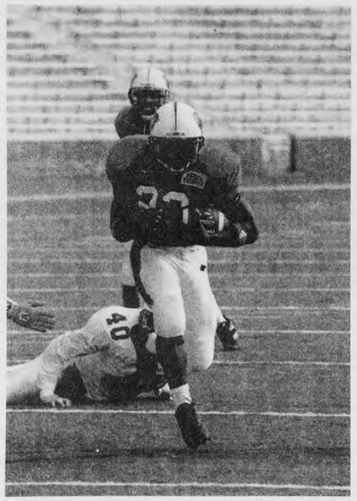
After throwing an interception on their next possession, the Bison seemed deflated. The football remained in the middle of the field for the remainder of the third quarter, as neither team was able to get any offensive momentum going.

To begin the fourth quarter, the Bison offense put together a promising drive that culminated in a 6-yard touchdown run by Wilson. Wilson's 6-yard scamper was only made possible by a tough catch by Jim Horan '03, who came up just two catches short of tying the career mark for catches by a Bucknell player, and also earned player of the game honors. The touchdown, which was the first for the Bison in 171 minutes of play, made the score 34-7.

Following another Bucknell fumble, the Rams were able to run out the clock, and secure the 34-7 victory, and the Patriot League title.

The Bison ended the season with a 2-9 record, their first losing season in the past eight years. Even though much of the season was overshadowed by the losses, there were still a lot of positives that came out of the season for the Bison.

The Bison had four players named to the All-Patriot League team. The preseason defensive player of the year, Adam Lord '03, was named co-defensive player of the year. Outside linebacker Joe Massey '03 and inside linebacker Stephane Pluviose '04 were also named to the first team All-League team. Offensive tackle Rashad Stallworth '04 was picked for the second team All-League offensive team.



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Blamah Sarnor '06 carries the ball for the Bison in an earlier game against Lafayette. Sarnor averaged 2.0 yards per carry against Fordham.

Along with these achievements, three Bison players were named to the Verizon Academic All-District team. Linebacker and punter Billy Windle '03 and tight end Dave Gibson '04 were named to the first team, while strong safety Will Smith '04 was named to the second team.

"There are a lot of positive factors, but the only way to achieve success in the future is through incredibly hard work," Kotulski said. "The biggest thing we have to reinstall is confidence."

The Bison will look to regain their confidence throughout spring practice, and promise to put a solid group of players back on the field next fall.

The Hall of Fame

Last weekend the National Baseball Hall of Fame announced the roster for this year's induction ballot. As it is with every year, the list is comprised of two contingents—a fresh crop of newly-eligible players making their debut on the list, and a cluster of also-rans clambering for a second, third, fourth or even 15th chance to garner the 75 percent approval rating required for election into baseball's mecca of immortality.

The men in this latter classification, although they are usually afforded perfunctory media coverage, are often the target topics of the most irreconcilable debates among baseball writers.

The annual sportswriter spats are as much a part of December as illuminated lawn reindeer, and are generally just about as functional. Each writer picks a snubbed, "should-be" Hall of Famer or two, and vehemently backs his charge until one of two things happens—either the player scrabbles his way past the 75 percent barrier and onto a Hall of Fame plaque, or his 15th year of eligibility runs dry and he vanishes from contention. In the interim between, these players are left to float around in limbo, with enough voter support to keep their dreams fueled, but not enough to land them anywhere other than next year's ballot.

Although fans' and writers' bemoaning of injustice seems to echo in perpetual futility, there are a few occasions when voter oversights might merit a call to arms, a battery of questioning or at least a little head-scratching. Blatant bias is one of them, and that seems to be the case when it comes to electing pitchers.

Pitchers in general haven't exactly been slighted, with 58 representatives among the 207 players in the Hall of Fame. But of those 58, only two were relief pitchers (Hoyt Wilhelm and Rollie Fingers).

There's no question that baseball's streetsweepers, the custodians of the mound, have been drastically underappreciated. Among the slighted hurlers is Bruce Sutter, who will be contending for a Hall of Fame slot for the 10th time.

Sutter, a pure closer who never started a single major-league game, has been deemed unworthy of Hall status by the collective vote of the Baseball Writers Association of America, not just once or twice, but nine times over. Although his vote count has been creeping steadily upward over the past few years, he'll need a big boost to jump up from the 50.52 percent of votes he received in 2002.

Sutter's numbers are admirable, but the argument in his favor gains a lot of its clout from his impact on the art of relief pitching. And whether some historians like it or not, the bullpen matters. It's mattered for half a century, and it's going to keep mattering. So why, then, doesn't the guy who revolutionized it matter?

The full-bearded hurler wasn't just a staple of the bullpen; he was the bullpen, according to Cardinals manager Whitey Herzog. Sutter was a workhorse for Herzog during his four years with the Cardinals, as he had been during his five season with the Chicago Cubs prior to that.

He pitched in 661 games over 12 seasons, racking up saves in 300 of them and striking out 861. In 1982, he proved himself a linchpin in the Cardinals' championship machine, pitching 4.1 perfect innings in the League Championship Series and then winning game two and saving games three and seven en route to a World Series championship.

When it comes to Sutter's greatness, it makes sense to apply the following trusty adage—it's not what he did; it's how he did it. Sutter gave the sport more than just a few winning moments—he gave it the split-fingered fastball, a wicked, divebombing pitch that can make decent hitters look like they belong in another profession.

He allegedly learned the pitch in 1973 from minor-league pitching coach and ex-major-leaguer Freddie Martin, who showed Sutter an experimental grip and told him to give it a try. Sutter, who was recovering from elbow surgery and needed a minor miracle to salvage his evanescing career, gripped the ball like Martin suggested and let it rip. The two had created a monster.

Sutter would spend the ensuing years perfecting the pitch, masterminding its usage and intimidating countless batters. By the time he retired, the split-fingered fastball was there to stay, permanently engrained in the league's general repertoire of pitches.

His bio on the Hall of Fame's Web site lists among his many credentials, which include a Cy Young award in 1979 and four all-star appearances, the following phrase: "... revolutionized the split-fingered fastball." If a guy revolutionizes anything that important, and does it while putting up superb statistical numbers and simply mastering his role on the team, he probably belongs in the Hall of Fame.

Sutter is one of three relief pitchers among this year's potential inductees who deserve eternal enshrinement in the hallowed museum, along with Rich Gossage and Lee Smith. Smith, whose numbers are stratospheric, ought to be a shoe-in, which means that Sutter and Gossage will probably be shooed out once again. After all, voting for more than one relief pitcher in the same year might cause some sort of catastrophic implosion of the baseball universe.

Of course, there's a lot of voting left to be done, and nothing is certain until the results are revealed in January. It's tempting to hope that almighty justice will swoop down from the great above and grant Sutter his long-awaited break.

To see the bearded innovator finally take his well-deserved place in the sadly understaffed bullpen of history's Hall of Fame "team" would be nothing short of, well ... a relief.

Staying afloat

Turkey is good. The serotonin still resides in my system: Football was played at 12:30 p.m. between the Lions and Patriots, with the Patriots coming away with a shocking victory. Following that was an old rivalry between the 'Skins and the 'Boys. The Dallas Cowboys and Washington Redskins squared off at Texas Stadium with the end result a 'Boys 27-20 victory—the Cowboys 10th straight versus the Redskins.

"It is becoming one of those psyche things," Redskin defensive tackle Dan Wilkerson said.

The Dallas-Washington rivalry, once the most bitter rivalry in the NFL, has become the most lopsided. No other team has as long of winning streak going against another team, and it's the longest in the history of this 85-game series.

The remarkable part is that Dallas is only 33-48 against the rest of the league since this roll began in November 1997.

The Cowboys have been entertaining fans Dallas perched on the shoulder of Emmit Smith and his 144-yard running attack, the most since he tallied 150 against Washington in December 2000. The loss probably burst any chance Steve Spurrier had at making the playoffs. All the hype of this matchup this Thanksgiving stemmed from a comment Spurrier made in his hiring speech as coach of the Redskins.

When Spurrier was hired in January, he promised owner Dan Snyder the game ball from his first victory over Dallas. A clip of that comment was played inside Texas Stadium just before kickoff, drawing boos that quickly turned to cheers when the screen turned black except for the words, "Not Today, Steve!"

America's team doesn't need to be infuriated. Glad you learned your lesson, Steve.

What was promising was the play of Cowboys quarterback Chad Hutchinson who was 12-of-25 for 145 yards and two touchdowns, including a 29-yard touchdown to Antonio Bryant that gave Dallas a 7-0 second quarter lead. Chad seems to have gained the confidence of his teammates and looks to be the future quarterback in Dallas for years to come, eliminating Quincy Carter's reign.

All good things must come to an end. Over Thanksgiving break the Indiana Pacers found a way to beat the 14-0 Dallas Mavericks 110-98, in a game that could have tied the Mavericks with the Houston Rockets and Washington Bullets as best start in NBA history.

Dallas, a night after pounding the Detroit Pistons, was obviously suffering from back-to-back road games. While the Mavericks fought hard, they were overrun by the deep and talented Pacer lineup, which just made available New York Knick enemy No. 1 Reggie Miller. Miller, who suffered an ankle sprain at the beginning of the season that kept him on the sidelines for the first 14 games of the season, will add yet another offensive weapon to a team that includes power forward sensation Jermaine O'Neal, Ron Artest and Brad Miller.

Dartmouth's swimming and diving team (above) has been cut due to budget cuts. The team recently posted a bid on eBay for a full donation of $211,000 in order to keep the swimming program afloat.

Even though the Mavericks did not complete the record-setting start, they were honored for their accomplishments. On Dec. 2, guards Michael Finley and Steve Nash and forward/center Dirk Nowitzki were selected as the NBA's Western Conference Players of the Month for November. They were the guiding lights for the Mavs, coming within one victory of equaling the best start (15-0) in league history. Coach Don Nelson was named NBA Western Conference Coach of the Month for guiding the Mavericks to the brink of history.

Next is a story only Generation X kids would stumble upon. After a decision was handed down from higher administration eliminating Ivy League college Dartmouth's swimming and diving teams, one swimmer came up with a most ingenious plan. Sophomore Jenny Kunkel, who swims the butterfly, backstroke and the individual medley, posted a bid on eBay for a full donation of $211,000 needed to keep the swimming program afloat.

"In the first night, we got 4,000 hits," said Kunkel. Four-thousand hits and only one exploratory bid as of 5 p.m. Wednesday. This is one event I don't want to turn out as the Decker Effect, a topic I will explore more next week.

Why the problem? Dartmouth administration called for a $260,000 reduction of their annual athletic budget of $10.8 million. Cutting the swimming program would save the college $212,000 or 1.96 percent of its yearly athletic budget, and was targeted as the major cut.

Kunkel and company are even prepared to transfer colleges if a settlement is not finalized.

Atlanta (8-3-1) at Tampa Bay (9-3)

This game features the most explosive quarterback in the league against the league's top defense. The last time these two met that defense knocked Vick out of the game. This time Vick will be looking for vengeance and for first place in the NFC South. The Falcons are one of the league's hottest teams, and hold this season's longest unbeaten streak, at 8 games. The last time they lost was to these same Buccaneers. Ultimately, this game, like the Falcons' season, rests on Vick's shoulders. Unfortunately for Vick, against the Bucs defense he won't be able to rush for 173 yards like he did last week. Tampa Bay has won the last four showdowns between these two. Expect that to be five.

Buffalo (6-6) at New England (7-5)

This divisional battle has major playoff implications, for AFC East is the closest division in the league where all four teams are separated by a single game. This is a must-win game for Buffalo if they hope to stay in the playoff hunt. Last week they beat divisional rival Miami to stay alive; now they have a tougher task in New England. If they lose this week, the Bills will not only fall two games back in the division, but will also lose the tiebreaker to New England. This game will be determined by the Bills' offensive line, if they can protect Bledsoe in the pocket and open a few holes for Henry Buffalo will win this game out of pure necessity. Time to circle the wagons! Sorry Flack, Gerald wins this one.

Houston (3-9) at Pittsburgh (7-4-1)

Do I even need to say much about this game, besides how much the Steelers are going to win by? How about I just rant about how pissed I am that the Steelers are 7-4-1 instead of 8-4. They should have won that game against Atlanta, not tied. That was bull! OK, so Vick is good, but to blow a 17-point lead and then to not win in overtime ... come on, less than one more yard and they would have won. Oh yeah, just to mention, Madden is back as the starting quarterback for Pittsburgh.

Oakland (8-4) at San Diego (8-4)

This season has been a seesaw of ups and downs for the Raiders. They won four, lost four and are currently riding a four-game winning streak. So the question arises, which team will show up for this all-important divisional matchup for first place in the AFC West? The last time they played, San Diego caught Oakland in the middle of their slide. With a win this week, they could take a potential two-game lead in the division because they would own the almighty tiebreaker over Oakland. This game pits the young smashmouth style of the Chargers against the aerial mastery of an aging Raiders squad. I gotta go with the experience, and the fact that the Raiders are playing awesome football right now.

Chicago (3-9) at Miami (7-5)

Fiedler's back. Williams is awesome, Miami wins ... nuff said!

Bambi and the village drunk

The leaves have all fallen and you wish you had an extra coat. It's that time of the year. You don't want to go out for food because it's cold and windy out in the open, so you sit camouflaged in the brush. It's comfortable but the hunger pangs are getting to you and your parched tongue is lolling out of your mouth with thirst.

You sneak out from your cozy shelter and brush up against a tree; it's almost as cold as you are. Leaves crunch under your weight and you wish the wind wouldn't carry the sound so much.

Moving as quietly as you can past roots and fallen branches, caring not to stumble, you realize it's colder than you thought. A gust of wind welcomes you to the open area surrounding the pond. Ducking your head to the water, you lap your tongue, creating ripples that collide with the ones the wind blows. It's a good day.

BLAM! Your skull collapses as the Homady 139 grain boattail spire point bullet from the 7mm Remington Magnum hunting rifle plows through your cranium. Your four legs crumple under your body and you think and feel no more. You are a deer and today starts hunting season. Welcome to America, better wear a cup 'cause we play hardball.

Yeah, you heard right, we're coming after YOU, Bambi. You thought you were all safe and secure living in "nature," but no, we're smoking you out. It's easy and fun. It wasn't enough to place rivers of cement across your wood paths and jam a metric ton of aluminum up your white-tailed rear if you ever dared to cross. Now we're taking back what's rightfully ours ... everything.

This pathetic display of "humanity" or "masculinity" or whatever killing animals is supposed to show about ourselves has got to stop. Above all, the rhetoric that we're doing this as a "sport" has to stop. As a sports enthusiast, I find it objectionable that this arcane practice can be mentioned in the same breath as something recreational and competitive. Football, baseball, horseback riding, skeet shooting, archery, foxy boxing, mud wrestling ... these are sports.

But I want it made abundantly clear that hunting is legalized cock fighting. We're putting a monkey with a shiv in a ring with a gimp-turkey. It is not a sport if it's not a level playing field (and a match between the L.A. Lakers and the Chicago Bulls doesn't count). There is no sport in senseless and indiscriminant slaughter.

They used to do this in ancient Rome. They put a bunch of slaves in the Colosseum and watched as great warriors tore their limbs from their bodies from encircling chariots. One would think we'd advanced beyond such an arcane and barbaric practice. I suppose not. Maybe we should reinstall vomitoriums in everyone's house ... no meal is complete without reversing the peristaltic effect so that I can run back to the table for my 13th helping. Maybe I should go dump my chamber pot onto the sidewalk while I'm at it.

Do you realize we are the only species on earth that kills for sport? A lion kills for food or defense, not because the wildebeest went to get a glass of water. And if you try to tell me that you hunt for the food, then you have the brain capacity of Linda Tripp because venison sausage has all the flavor of a flame-broiled Goodyear Aquatred. Not to mention that we raise millions of cattle and pigs and slaughter them en masse to stock the shelves at the supermarket, so why not just take advantage of the convenient, corporate-sanctioned sanctioned mass slaughter.

An online article at telvsplanet.net about the defense of hunting states, "Virtually all of the hunter's time is spent observing their quarry's habits, movements and learning about the animals' environment. In other words, a nature walk with a goal."

I like how we get to know a deer on a personal level before revoking its right to live. In most circles, this is called "stalking," but the term "nature walk with a goal" sounds much less sordid.

The article continues, "Understanding why we hunt is probably the most important part of any argument. When we don't give a good reason to hunt, we lose all credibility."

I'm glad the author of this article had the four brain cells necessary to piece together that clever little nugget of argumentation. Fulbright scholar he is not.

But there's more. "Maintaining the ecological balance ensuring that particular types of game populations don't get too large is a good reason for hunting. It doesn't justify hunting on the emotional level, however."

The argument that we need hunting to control the deer population is about as weak as a Russian figure skating performance. How's this for ecological balance: In 1997, 99 hunters were killed due to firearm accidents.

But I actually like that statistic. It shows where the future of hunting is headed—the future is letting a skein of ignorant hicks who think it's fun to bully the wildlife population loose in a park and allow them to take pot shots at each other until there's only one solipsistic monstrosity of a man left with his high cranial ridge and low fontanel drift dragging his wooden club over his hunched shoulders while his Neolithic knuckles drag loosely across the blood-strewn grass. Then, in a last coup de grâce, this objectionable specimen should be flown to Texas where the death penalty is not just legalized but glorified as if Pontius Pilate himself had decreed the fatwa and set this man before a jury of deer, elk and other woodland creatures.

But the fact is, these gaptoothed fiends aren't going anywhere. So here are a few signs that may give you a head start as you plan your evacuation. If you hear bird calls that sound like a cat getting a hysterectomy, that's a good sign. If you see anyone wearing phosphorescent orange, a color that screams, "I haven't been laid in years and I'm fairly certain it'll stay that way," that's also a good indication you should be hunkering down in a cave somewhere. And if you hear someone whining that, "They're trying to take my guns away," know that the vindictive wrath of the God of Job is about to be brought upon you and your friends and you should vacate with all the haste of Moses from Egypt.

Bucknell drops its first home contest of the season

Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

Forward Ben Slater '04 is about to bring it up strong against Canisius last Tuesday. Slater was fouled on the play, sinking one of two free throws.

"They would make big plays when they counted. If we don't have to dig ourselves out of a hole early then we won't have to fight back so hard anymore."

Bucknell had two opportunities to take the lead when they trailed by one point down the stretch, but Bettencourt and Quinn both failed to capitalize on their respective three-point shots. Although Canisius shot only 56 percent from the foul line for the game, they made their attempts when they counted most and the Bison were not able to tie the game or take the lead on a single possession in the last minute of play.

Second half miscues and 50 percent foul shooting were the nemeses, aside from Canisius, of the Bison on the evening. The Bison look to even their record on Saturday afternoon at 3:15 pm against Saint Francis of Pennsylvania.

A number of Bison broke pool records during the meet against Army. Meghan Freese '04 broke the pool record in the 50-meter free with a time of 24.26, while Darby Golino '03 broke the record in the 200 IM with an impressive time of 2:11.71. She also broke the 200-meter backstroke with a time of 2:06.57.

Jackie Feinthel '05 placed first in the 200-fly, and Freese clocked 53.70 in the 100 free to gain another first-place finish on the day. With a time of 5:10.37 Faas made another first-place showing in the 500 free, and Flick timed 2.27.16 in the 200-yard breaststroke to gain yet another first-place finish.

"We really want to go undefeated this year, and if we keep swimming the way we have been it is a definite possibility."
—Lectie Altman '06

With the victory the women's squad has improved its record to 4-0 overall.

"We really want to go undefeated this year," Altman said. "If we keep swimming the way we have been it is a definite possibility."

Mens

With a 1-2 overall record, the men's squad has faltered a little at the beginning of the season, but is looking forward to proving themselves in the future.

By recording 270.07 points in Adam Freeman '05 placed first in the one-meter diving event. He tallied 250.11 points, in order to gain second place in the three-meter diving competition.

His 250.11 points is his highest score in the three-meter for the season.

In the 200-yard breaststroke, William Schilling '06 placed second with an impressive time of 2:10.42. The time placed him eighth on the All-Time list for Bucknell.

Mark Kretzer '06, Stelios Saffos '03, Michael Harrigan '04 and Peter Garvin '04 placed second for Bucknell in the 400-yard medley relay with a time of 3:33.06. Kurt McCoy '03 placed second with a time of 10:03.43, while Gonzalo Diaz '03 placed third with a time of 10:11.07 in the 1,000 free.

In the 200 IM Kretzer placed second with a time of 2:00.49, Matt Hallowell '04 gained the third place position with a time of 2:01.18, while Jack Sheehan '04 gained fourth place with the a time of 2:02.57.

The Bison will host the Bucknell Trials and Finals meet this weekend in Arthur D. Kinney Natatorium, with a start time of 10:30 a.m.

Hillel teaches the meaning of Hanukkah

By Caitlin McKee
Staff Writer

The Hillel chapter at the University wants to expand children's understanding of Hanukkah beyond the lyrics of Adam Sandler's "Hanukkah Song." Hillel entertained children from Lewisburg's Donald Hieter Community Center with fun and informative activities relating to Hanukkah this past Tuesday. Rebecca Schofield '05, a member of Hillel, said education was the main goal of the activities.

"The goal of the program was to educate kids about Hanukkah. This way if they see a menorah or a dreidel in someone's window, they can say, 'Oh, that person is Jewish, they are celebrating Hanukkah,'" Schofield said.

The University's Rabbi and Jewish Chaplain, Serena Fujita, is the adviser to Hillel. Fujita said that promoting religious tolerance was another goal of the program.

"We want to help children of different backgrounds understand our culture and religion," Fujita said.

Hillel offered the children a wide variety of activities. The kids decorated Hanukkah cookies, played with dreidels and competed in a coloring contest where each child colored the different symbols of Hanukkah. Hillel also added a theatrical activity to their program. University students acted out the story of Hanukkah for the kids. The children were very responsive to the play.

"The kids were so enthusiastic about the story that they wanted to act it out themselves. So, we re-enacted the story with the kids," Schofield said.

Both Fujita and Schofield agree that the program at the Heiter center was very successful.

"The program was a wonderful success. There were lots of Hillel students and about 15 kids from the center. I think we succeeded in all of our goals," Fujita said.

This is the first year that Hillel has worked with the Heiter Community Center. Hillel intends to increase its interaction with the Lewisburg community.

"Hillel is a growing organization, so this is the first year that we have gotten out into the community, but we would like to get more involved," Schofield said.

Hillel sponsors many programs throughout the year that range from Friday night Shabbat dinners to trips to the Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C.

"Hillel celebrates the Sabbath weekly with a Kabbalat Shabbat service on Friday evenings. Hillel also sponsors the celebration of other Jewish holidays and holy days with dinners and services. In the spring there are two seders that are open to the entire campus community to celebrate Passover," Fujita said. "We also sponsor Jewish educational programs including this fall's program called Death By Chocolate—an exploration of Jewish tests in regard to life after death."

Hillel strives to serve the University's Jewish community.

"Hillel is dedicated to fostering an open Jewish community and sees as its purpose and responsibility meeting the needs of Bucknell's Jewish population. Hillel provides social opportunities, celebrates Jewish holidays, enriches understanding of Jewish traditions and culture and promotes learning and exchange of ideas," Fujita said.

The chapter does not exclusively serve the University's Jewish population. Hillel promotes religious tolerance on campus and encourages students of all religions to participate in its events.

"Bucknell Hillel is committed to enhancing religious and cultural diversity in the broader campus community," Fujita said.

Candlelighting ignites the holiday season

By Josie Cetta
Features Editor

One of the University's most beloved traditions, Candlelighting, will be held on Dec. 6, 8 and 10 at 7:30 p.m. in Rooke Chapel. University students started lining up at 6 a.m. on the first day tickets were available for a chance to attend the ceremony. In one morning, all 2,400 free tickets were gone, and for the past two years, all three services have been sold out in less than two hours.

"The Candlelight Services provide a wonderful opportunity to bring the campus and the Lewisburg community together. Numerous people throughout the region look forward to the service and willingly stand in line to be sure to get tickets for the event. Many have told me that it begins the season for them because it is an opportunity to experience the Christmas story through music and word," said William Payn, director of choral studies at the University.

The traditional two-hour Candlelighting Ceremony, officially called "The Candlelight Service of Lessons and Carols," is loosely based on the famous service of lessons and carols at King's College, Cambridge University, in England. Payn conducts the ceremony, featuring both the Rooke Chapel Choir and the Rooke Chapel Ringers.

"The ceremony is the most beautiful way I can think of to start off the holiday season. It really brings out the true meaning of Christmas through the readings of the birth of Jesus and the music that celebrates the occasion," said Allison Hysong '03, manager of the Ringers for the past two years.

Payn, director of the Candlelight Service of Carols since he first came to the University in 1982, will be celebrating his 20th Candlelighting this year. The service was begun in 1964 by William D. McRae, founder of the Chapel Choir and University professor of music emeritus. Payn added the hand bell ringers in 1983 and introduced the traditional "Ringing-In-Of Christmas," which occurs at the end of the service.

"Putting the Candlelight services together each year is one of the highlights of my first semester work. I will continue with the service until I retire from Bucknell. I assume the tradition will continue long after I am gone," Payn said.

Participants of the event have been preparing for the ceremony since the beginning of fall semester.

"We begin practicing and learning music for Candlelighting usually at the beginning of October. We sing through some of the music before then, but we really begin to focus on it during October," Amanda Robie '03, manager of the Chapel Choir, said.

The Candlelighting Ceremony does live up to its name—there are candles everywhere. Candles line the aisles and the front of the chapel and every participant gets a candle, which is lit for the singing of "Silent Night," toward the end of the service.

So who actually lights all those candles?

"We have eight student ushers for every service who help with the candle lighting," University Chaplain Ian Oliver, coordinator of the readings, said.

Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

Dr. William Payn directs the Rooke Chapel Choir as they continue to perfect their carols during the final days before their performances this weekend. Both the Chapel Choir and the Chapel Ringers have been rehearsing their show since the beginning of fall semester.

The service is made up of seven lessons from Bible readings telling the Christmas story. There are two scriptures from the book of Isaiah, which have traditionally been interpreted by Christians as foretelling the birth of Jesus Christ, three from the Gospel of Luke (the annunciation to Mary, the birth story and the story of the shepherds), one from the Gospel of Matthew (the story of the Magi) and one from the Gospel of John (on the Incarnation).

> "The Candlelight Services provide a wonderful opportunity to bring the campus and the Lewisburg community together. Many have told me that it begins the season for them because it is an opportunity to experience the Christmas story through music and word."
> —Dr. William Payn, Professor of music*

"The explicit message is the story of Advent and Christmas—the Christian story of the expectation for and birth of Jesus. This story is told through 2,000 years of the most beautiful sacred Christmas music from around the world," Oliver said.

According to Oliver, seniors, faculty and staff who are active in Christian groups on or off campus nominate the readers.

"We select readers from all walks of campus life to give the large crowds, up to 850 per night, a sense of Bucknell," Oliver said.

Oliver also prepares the Christmas Prayer, which is said just before the singing of "Silent Night."

"The readings stay exactly the same every year and act as sort of Chapter headings around which the new music for choir and ringers is structured," Oliver said.

Seasonal music and traditional Christmas songs from around the world are performed by the Chapel Choir and the Chapel Ringers. The ringers play eight songs, alternating with the Chapel Choir, the readings and the Christmas carols. Some songs to be played by the Chapel Ringers include "Come, Thou Fount of Ev'ry Blessing," "The Wexford Carol," "Manger Lullaby" and "O For A Thousand Tongues."

"Usually the songs vary from year to year, but we always play 'The March of the Kings,' which is our signature piece and a crowd pleaser," Hysong said.

"We work to make the service different and special each year, while keeping the basic message the same," Oliver said.

There are favorites that remain from year to year including "Still Still Still," by Norman Luboff, and the traditional carols of "All Creatures of our God on High," "O Come, All Ye Faithful," "On This Day Earth Shall Ring," "Hark the Herald Angels Sing" and "Joy to the World."

Also, the carols "Once In Royal David's City" and "Silent Night" have solos performed by different singers each night of the ceremony. This year's performance of "Once In Royal David's City" will be performed by Sara Mastrony '03 on Friday night, Allison Davies '04 on Sunday night and Leanne Meriton '05 on Tuesday night. "Silent Night" will be sung by Alison Landgraf '03 on Friday night, Kathryn O'Heir '03 on Sunday night and Katherine Palumbo '04 on Tuesday night.

A solo song is also sung annually by a senior music major, which will be Robie this year singing "Polish Lullaby."

"This year, the Chapel Choir is singing many traditional carols, some of which use nontraditional harmonies," Robie said.

The Chapel Ringers are chosen by audition and must have prior experience. Payn holds auditions for the Chapel Choir at the beginning of each school year. The choir is a part of the Sunday non-denominational Christian services.

"The Chapel Choir is a highly select group of singers, but the singers come from all majors throughout the University," Robie said.

According to Payn, there are many "behind the scenes" people who come together to make the ceremony work—physical plant personnel who set the stage and decorate the sanctuary; Ruth Ann Craven, the chapel secretary, who handles tickets and ushers; Connie Boyer, University Custodian who does decorations and lighting; and Art Moser, Mail Services Supervisor, who donates and creates wreaths. In the end, their collective efforts shine through.

"At the end of the ceremony we ring in Christmas. We have invited students from Bucknell to be extra ringers to help us do the job. We surround the congregation and play peals on the bells and then Payn comes in with the organ and the whole congregation sings 'Joy to the World,'" Oliver said.

The service is video taped every four years, by WVIA-TV in Wilkes-Barre/Scranton, so that every choir and ringer member gets a chance to be on television. The production was nominated for an Emmy in 1996.

The ceremony will not be taped again until next year. Public Broadcasting System television stations throughout the world will be airing the Thursday, Dec. 2, 1999 Candlelight Service from Dec. 22-25.

Rutgers professor gives lecture on Jane Austen

By Rachel Gold
Senior Writer

William Galperin, professor of English at Rutgers University, spoke about "the body in Jane Austen's last works," at this semester's Robbins Lecture, given by a professor in a particular English genre, on Thursday, Nov. 21. Galperin, an expert on Jane Austen's novels and the Romantic period, split his lecture into four parts, focusing mostly on Austen's last work, "Persuasion" and her unpublished novel "Sandition."

"Austen wrote her novels in the 1790s, and the world in which she was writing about had disappeared when her works were finally published in the mid-1800s," Galperin said.

As a result, Austen's novels are permeated with a tone of nostalgia, however not in the conservative "looking back" sense of the word. Nostalgia, Galperin believes, refers more to the optimistic view that change is just around the corner.

Galperin discussed the use of "free independent discourse" as a form of narration commonly found in Austen's works.

"Ann, the main character in 'Persuasion,' maintains autonomy rather then being at the disposal of ideology," Galperin said.

He also discussed family and class issues in Austen's work. Galperin contends that Ann is neither strictly selfish nor autonomous in "Persuasion" but, rather, her individualism reflects conservatism.

"The reader is free to question if they are reading about Ann, or Ann according to the narrator. There is less direct criticism in 'Persuasion' than in 'Emma,' for in 'Persuasion' Ann's autonomy and selfishness allows her to escape 'persuasion' by internalizing a space for herself," Galperin said.

Galperin spoke to the audience on the concept of "learned romance."

"Ann's agency is open to interpretation in 'Persuasion.' She resists being 'over-persuaded' while dealing with the fact that she has lost her bloom, to be quite frank, and is simultaneously restricted by social laws and norms," Galperin said.

He spoke about the ideology of desire and its discourse. Ann, he said, had an impulse of "self-preservation" while dealing with the circumstantial details of domesticity and marriage.

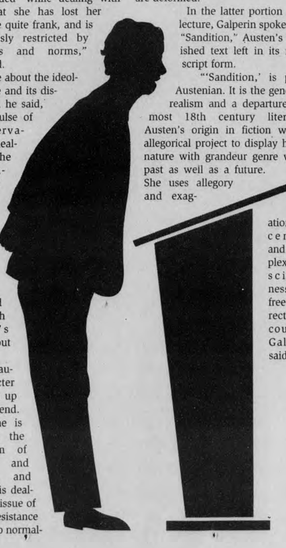
Any reader passionate about Austen's novels could identify with Galperin's assertion about her themes.

"The beautiful character of Ann ends up at a dead end. For one, she is faced with the social norm of marriage and domesticity, and for two she is dealing with the issue of a Utopian resistance or aversion to normalcy," Galperin said.

He also touched on the role misogyny plays in Austen's works, seeing that "women of 'Persuasion' are deformed because they are subordinate and subordinated because they are deformed."

In the latter portion of the lecture, Galperin spoke about "Sandition," Austen's unfinished text left in its manuscript form.

"'Sandition,' is purely Austenian. It is the genesis of realism and a departure from most 18th century literature. Austen's origin in fiction was an allegorical project to display human nature with grandeur genre with a past as well as a future. She uses allegory and exaggeration with central and complex consciousness of free indirect discourse," Galperin said.



Galperin further discussed the relationship between opposition and progression.

"Austen maintains autonomy rather than the disposal of ideology. In 'Sandition,' interestingly enough the anorexic, hypochondriac and socially rebellious characters outside the 'quotations' are exceptionally healthy. These characters practice pathological objection and act in opposition to the group. As a result, these characters are able to make progress towards disenchantment of their problems," Galperin said.

Before opening the lecture up for a period of question and answer, Galperin ended with, "disappointment, however present, is always answerable."

The Willard Smith Library was filled with many University English professors who are also very well-read on Austen and the Romantic period.

"This disease of language you speak of, are we dealing with hysteria? Is this a narrative 'disease'?" Assistant Professor of English Ghislaine McDayter said.

The audience laughed when Galperin said, "Ann is healthiest when she is autonomous and looks ugly. She is 'sick' when she 'falls into quotation.' This is the paradox of ideology."

"I guess Ann becomes a radical outside of language and therefore it's a lose-lose situation for her," McDayter said.

"Yes, you can no longer celebrate being ugly and single," Galperin said.

Galperin once again touched on the confusion of narration, often a topic of debate in Austen's novels.

"Austen's free, independent discourse is often met with hard tough skepticism anchored in lost opportunity and disappointment," Galperin said.

He said that Austen's narrative is equal to liberalism; it is a voice from nowhere.

"Her use of free, independent discourse casts everything before the 'I' into a more critical light," Galperin said.

> "Professor Galperin's lecture really brought out the social and gender issues that I find so compelling and timeless in Austen's books."
> —Kasey Morgenheim '04

English major Kasey Morgenheim '04 enjoyed Galperin's lecture.

"Professor Galperin's lecture really brought out the social and gender issues that I find so compelling and timeless in Austen's books," Morgenheim said.

Since Morgenheim will be taking a course about Austen in Bath, England next semester she wanted to learn more about her novels from an expert reader of the Romantic period.

Associate Professor and English Department Chair John Rickard enjoys attending the lectures lead by well-respected members of academia.

"It's a great treat to have speakers at the Robbins Lecture each year. It gives students the opportunity to hear a challenging point of view. The Robbins lecture gives professors and students the chance to know what's going on in the area of scholarship," Rickard said.

Opera Company masters Mozart

By Julianna Pietak
Senior Writer

The Bucknell Opera Company provided a showcase of the beautiful and virtuosic music of Mozart, as well as the rich talent of University students, on Saturday, Nov. 23. The show, entitled "Mozart Magic," consisted of various scenes from four of Mozart's operas, all dating from the end of the 18th century.

The company opened with selected scenes from the comedic "Don Giovanni," set in 17th century Seville. This opera unfolds the adventures of the libertine and central character Don Giovanni.

Students from the Bucknell Opera Company perform in "Mozart Magic." The show consisted of various scenes from four of Mozart's operas.

Beginning with a recitative, a type of "speak-singing" common to opera, this opening scene then moved to "Ah Chi Mi Dice Mai."

In this song, Donna Elvira, performed by Nadia Nash '03, sings of a lover who has stood her up. Don Giovanni and his servant Leporello, portrayed by Kyle McGee '04 and Eric Loveland '03, respectively, look on as they are drawn to the woman. When Don Giovanni approaches her, he realizes that this woman has been one of his many conquests, and it is he who has abandoned her.

The comedic song performed by Loveland afterwards informs Donna Elvira that she is only one of thousands of Don Giovanni's conquests, and goes through a list of how many there have been.

We then see Don Giovanni shift his desires to the country maiden Zerlina, performed by Amanda Robie '03, wooing her with promises of marriage. Donna Elvira confronts them in the angry "Ah! Fuggi il Traditor!" The last scene performed from this opera provides some resolution when Zerlina is reconciled with her abandoned lover in the humorous yet sentimental "Batti, Batti, o Bel Masetto."

Selections from "Die Zauberflote," or "The Magic Flute," followed on the program. It opened with the Queen of the Night, played by Rachel Crane '04, enacting a curse on Sarastro, played by Loveland. In the next song, "In Diesen Heil'gen Hallen," Sarastro is within the temple walls, singing of the safe haven they provide for him.

The plot then jumps to Papageno, the queen's bird catcher, performed by McGee. He sings the perky "Ein Madchen oder Weibchen" about someday finding a wife. His wife appears in the next scene performed in the shape of Papagena, leading to an equally perky duet about marriage and children between the two.

Another comedic plot develops in "Cosi fan Tutte." This opera relates the tale of Don Alfonso, an older cynic who devises a plan to test the faithfulness of his best friend's fiancées. Convinced that women are not to be trusted, he tells these sisters that their lovers have been sent to war then confronts them with temptations to see if they yield.

The sisters, Fiordiligi, sung by Crane, and Dorabella, performed by Robie, open with a sentimental ballad while admiring their lovers' pictures in their lockets. Don Alfonso then makes his entrance, and all three perform "Soave sia il Vento," a very lyrical ballad performed with close harmonies unusual to the operatic style.

The sisters then go into mourning with the news of their lovers being sent to war in the dramatic but humorous "Ag Scostati ... Smanie Implacabili che M'agitate." Their maid, who is looking on, encourages them to "forget and be gay" in the witty "In Uomini, in Soldati Sperare Fedelta."

Crane and Loveland then closed the night's show with a performance of "Durch Zartlichkeit und Schmeicheln" and "Ich Gehe Doch Rate ich Dir" from Mozart's "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail." The first piece, sung by Crane, tells of winning a woman's heart through tenderness and kindness. Loveland's Osmin provided the opposing view in the next song, which orders Crane's Blonde to love him. This soon erupts into a literal argument in song, ending the performance with Blonde chasing Osmin off the stage.

Each of the pieces done throughout the evening was colorful and skillfully performed. One obstacle common to enjoying opera today is the language barrier, as most classical operas were written in languages other than English. The University opera company sought to overcome this by projecting English translations of the songs being performed on to a screen over the stage.

Gospel choir fills the air with praise

By David Allen
Staff Writer

The Voices of Praise Gospel Choir gave a rousing performance in Bucknell Hall infused with a powerful spiritual element on Saturday Nov. 22.

"You haven't just come here for a concert, you're here for an experience," Director Tim Johnson's '04 said to the audience

Group member Nisan Trotter '05 gave a short introduction in which he conveyed his excitement for the evening's performance. He also encouraged the audience to participate in the group's performance.

"Pour your hearts into what God has for us tonight," Trotter said.

The choir's first set of songs was also prefaced by a short prayer by Melinda Kummer '05 and a reading of a Psalm of Thanks from the Bible by Shalanda Turner '06 and Matt Carriuolo '05.

The songs that the group performed reflected very strong spiritual beliefs and faith in God. One song included the refrain, "The Lord has been so good to me," delivering a very appropriate message of giving thanks at this concert, only days before the University's Thanksgiving break.

Raphael Hammond '05 was the featured soloist in a song entitled "Faith," in which the choir emphasized the power that faith in God gives ordinary people. The choir sang the refrain, "I can do the impossible, I can see the invisible," with conviction and energy. Members of the audience were encouraged to sing along, clap or to otherwise express themselves.

When some of the choir members took a break to rest their voices, Candacy McCalman '04 and Michelle McCotter '03 remained on stage and read Biblical passages from the Book of Psalms. Before the choir returned to the stage, Hammond gave a brief testimony talking about his life struggles and his conversion from a "thug" life to a Christian life guided by God. Hammond said that his conversion was brought about by a realization that he would not live forever. He gave thanks for the blessings in his life and stressed the importance of a positive outlook in life, seeing "gain, not loss; success, not failure."

The choir's next selection, "No Weapon," featured a solo by Nortey Yeboah '05. During the song, Johnson gave a brief speech in which he cited the song's refrain, "no weapon formed against me shall prosper," and identified racism as one such "weapon" that cannot be allowed to prosper in the University community. He asked members to stand in support of an end to racism on campus; all in the audience stood. Cara Anderman '03 said that she was especially moved by Johnson's message regarding the true nature of knowledge and learning at the University.

"If you don't learn how to love each other, then you've missed it," Anderman said.

The concert closed with two very powerful numbers. The first song, "Why Do We Sing?" gave the evening's program its title and borrowed lyrics from the traditional spiritual "His Eye is on the Sparrow" to help the choir express its true purpose with the lyrics, "I sing because I'm happy/I sing because I'm free/His eye is on the sparrow/That's the reason why we sing." The last song, "King of Kings," followed by the "Amen" refrain once again brought all members of the audience to their feet.

According to Melissa Agrimanakis '06, a Jewish student who attended the concert to support several of her friends, the performance was a very unique cultural experience.

Unappreciated art exhibit warrants visitors

By Kristen Habacht
Senior Writer

As many students around campus realize, the University is filled with resources available for our disposal, but few of them are ever used. One such example is the Edward and Marthann Samek Art Gallery in the Langone Center. Recently I took the opportunity to explore this resource and visit the Lewis deSoto exhibit. The exhibit, which runs through Monday, is titled "Paranirvana" and is a self-portrait of the artist. The piece is said to be one that "raises profound questions about life, death and spirituality." It is a painted cloth that inflates to an impressive 26-by-7-by-6 feet.

"The really exciting experience in the Lewis deSoto exhibition is to view to view the huge sculpture—which he calls 'Paranirvana (self-portrait)'—fill with air. Watch it breathe its first breaths each day when the gallery opens, or 15 minutes before the gallery closes one can watch it deflate and breathe its last breath," Associate Professor of Art Christiane Andersson.

"The sculpture is a provocative paradox," Daniel Mills, Art Gallery director, said. "It is monumental, yet empty; it depicts a massive and solid stone form, but it is as light as air and vulnerable. DeSoto effectually captures the moment between life and death—the last breath and the first instant after life."

In the catalogue essay, Stephanie Hanor explains what the exhibit's title, "Paranirvana," means.

"Paranirvana is the term for a divine state of consciousness higher than nirvana, the place obtained by the absence of all desire. Upon his death, the Buddha achieved the transcendental condition of 'total extinction' (or parinirvana) in which the physical elements of the human body and the material world are permanently left behind for a greater, more peaceful, spiritual transcendence."

Hanor also explained how this title relates to deSoto's work.

"DeSoto's representation of the exact moment between life and death, the moment of the Buddha's last breath, is reinforced by the action of the fan. Turned on each morning to inflate the work, the fan in effect 'breathes' air, and by implication, life into the Buddha. Each evening the fan is turned off, causing the work to deflate and visually expressing the passing of life and the expiring of the Buddha."

Dance Company performance will awe

By Kristi Johnston
Senior Writer

It's the end of the semester. That means finals, papers, getting ready for break ... and the Fall Dance Performance of the Bucknell Dance Company (BDC). This year's performance will be held today and tomorrow at 8 p.m. in the Harvey Powers Theatre. While it will undoubtedly feature the energy and grace that is a trademark of the BDC, this year's performance will include some changes from those of past years.

"I want to stress that this is a very special concert for us," Associate Professor of Dance and BDC Director Er-Dong Hu said. "I feel that we have captured a sense of unity and enthusiasm in working together throughout the semester. The concert is also unique in that we have been fortunate enough to enjoy the contributions that the theatre and dance department faculty have made in the areas of lighting, scenery and costumes."

Hu has choreographed a piece for the performance, called "Reminisce." In it, he hopes to convey the emotional aspects of memory and change in life.

"It is about those moments when you see something that reminds you of events and people in your past and it brings back all different types of emotions and memories about relationships you've had with people," Hu said.

Stephanie Yezek '03, Emily Cope '03, Lyn Wheeler, Victoria Willers '04 and guest artist Li-Chou have also choreographed pieces for the performance.

Hu said Chou's piece, entitled "Youth," is "a celebration of youth and the enjoyment of being young and beautiful. It uses classical ballet technique to portray a sense of joy and happiness in being young and full of energy."

Hu is enthusiastic about the level of talent and leadership that will be reflected in this year's performance.

"The variety of dance styles in the concert allows for our dancers to show their artistic breadth," he said. "In doing so, I feel that we are able to capture the individuality of each of our dancers as they are given the opportunity to showcase their strengths.

Hu is also looking forward to seeing students as leaders.

"I also believe that one of the major goals for producing a main-stage dance production is to allow the students to take on leadership roles through choreographing their own works. This allows them to experience the creative process and apply what they have learned in the classroom to creating their own work for the stage."

Tickets for the performance are $6 and are available at the Weis Center Box Office.

Students try Thai

Bucknell Association for Arts sponsors international cooking lessons

Lala Musayev '03 proudly presents her Thai dish. Because of the positive feedback received for the Thai cooking lessons, more international cooking lessons are slated to be held in the future.

Students tired of the choices offered by the Caf were given an opportunity to change their eating options by cooking for themselves. With funding from the Bucknell Association for the Arts, the Craft Center held international cooking lessons on Nov. 21. Pawin Sriusvagool '03 instructed the class of eight students in the art of Thai cooking.

Han Thurain '04, the Freemont Intern at the Craft Center, desired to incorporate culture and the arts. The resulting idea was international cooking lessons.

"We've always had the facilities to hold cooking lessons, but we've never used them until now," Craft Center Coordinator Gretchen Heuges said.

Chicken and cashew nuts were on the menu with all of the ingredients bought fresh from the market.

"The techniques taught of sautéing and reading recipes will aid students in applying their new skills to cooking other dishes as well," Sriusvagool said.

Sriusvagool was excited to be the first instructor in the new program and to bring Thai culture to the students.

"Thai cooking is well-known throughout the world, but it's not available in Lewisburg. These lessons are educational on more than one level," he said.

Due to the positive feedback from the first endeavor, the international cooking lessons are slated to be held again next semester with Russian and Turkish dishes.

BSG sets goal to gain campus visibility

By Elisabeth Salemme
News Editor

New executive officers for the Bucknell Student Government (BSG) were elected by the student body for the 2003 calender year just prior to winter break.

Katy Timer '04 will head BSG, Jack Phillips '04 will serve as Vice President of Operations, John Gray '04 will serve as Vice President of Finance and Jenn Pusty '05 will serve as Vice President of Administration.

According to Timer, a major goal for the new executive board is visibility. Timer said she plans to tackle this goal by reaching out to some of the campus leaders, such as presidents of clubs and organizations, Resident Assistants and the Interfraternity Council Panel to explain exactly what BSG does and how the office hours for the executive board can be used to serve students.

"I plan to accomplish this by sending a letter via campus mail to individual's mailboxes," Timer said.

Pusty also has plans to achieve the goal of visibility.

"I plan on utilizing the bulletin boards in the mail room to inform students of the different things that are going on in BSG. Information such as the minutes of meetings, appropriations decisions, announcements, updates and profiles of the members [will be provided]," Pusty said.

Timer said another goal she has is to work closely with the BSG Congress and the individual committees.

"The committees are where I see BSG being most effective. The members of the committees consist of students in every class year and a diverse background of involvement with Bucknell organizations and interests. Along with my own ideas, I would really like to use them as a resource for what projects BSG needs to work on," Timer.said

According to Vice President of the sophomore class Helen Britz, at the first meeting with the new executive board, the plan of visibility, strength-

Sojka Pavilion open for business

Men's and women's basketball teams take to the floor for the first time on Jan. 15

The Sojka Pavilion was officially dedicated in honor of 13th University President and Professor of Biology Gary Sojka on Wednesday, Jan. 15. The ceremony occurred between the women's and men's basketball games against Lehigh.

The new arena seats 4,000 people, and it was packed with faculty, staff, students and members of the Lewisburg community for the inaugural game. John Hardt, director of athletics and communications, said that more than 1,900 students attended the games and the dedication.

Chairperson of the Board of Trustees Lee Hamilton '57 welcomed the crowd and commented on the group assembled in the arena.

"It's appropriate to have the whole University family here to dedicate this building tonight," Hamilton said.

After cutting the ribbon with his wife Sandra, Sojka thanked everyone who had helped with the construction of the arena, from lead donors to the construction workers. He quickly pointed out that the new arena and the dedication ceremony was not, as Hamilton said, "all about one person, Gary Sojka."

"I know that it's dangerous to contradict the chairperson of the board, but I'm going to—you said it was all about a particular person, but it's not—it's about Bucknell," Sojka said.

Sojka recognized Joe Gibland, who was in attendance for the last game at Tustin Gym, the first game at Davis Gym and the first game at Sojka Pavilion.

The arena, Sojka said, is more than just a new building. It is part of the history and legacy of the University.

"Davis Gym represents the past—the future will be played out on these boards. Tonight we start to write a new chapter of Bucknell University," Sojka said.

Sojka also discussed the student-athletes, who were a "steady, unbroken line of orange and blue." He said that he was fortunate, as a teacher, to have had some of these students in his classes.

"We are truly among the nation's elite when it comes to college athletics in the production of Academic All-Americans, Patriot League Scholar-Athletes and athlete graduation rates," Sojka said.

He also spoke of the pavilion's many uses besides basketball, including student life activities that would not fit the atmosphere of Weis Center for the Performing Arts. Sojka also suggested the use of the arena as an alternative location for Commencement.

Concluding his remarks and showing his pride in the University, Sojka said, "Go Bison!"

University President Steffen Rogers spoke of the late Robert E. Smith '39, who served as chairman emeritus of the University Board of Trustees. Smith and his wife, Margaret Farrell Smith '41, contributed $8 million towards the new recreation and athletic center. Prior to his death in May, Smith privately asked that the arena be named for Sojka.

Smith was an economics major at the University as well as a member of the varsity basketball team. He played in the last game at Tustin Gym, and also in the inaugural game at Davis Gym.

"Wouldn't it have been wonderful if he had seen the last game at Davis Gym and the first game in Sojka Pavilion," Rogers said. "Bob and Margaret Smith brought their love for the University full circle by naming the pavilion for someone they admired, Gary Sojka."

Rogers spoke of Sojka's dedication to teaching and contributions to the University as both its president and a faculty member.

"There are few people in the world like Gary Sojka—so dedicated and focused and yet so personable. His drive and spirit are dedicated to teaching. Sojka is one of our finest

Surgala named interim VP Finance

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

To replace Lema, the University announced that the chief financial officer for the JPM Company in Lewisburg, David Surgala, would fill the position in the interim while a national search takes place.

He came to the University through many mutual relationships, and with the closing of the JPM facilities in Lewisburg, his job as CFO was ending. In addition, the University was without a financial leader, something that is necessary. Following meetings with University President Steffen Rogers, Surgala was offered the interim job and he accepted.

The University's quiet loss of Vice President for Finance and Administration (VPFA) Jo-Anne Lema at the close of last semester leaves many questions unanswered. The budget is faltering, spending cuts are in the works and the endowment of the University, according to the latest financial statements, is falling.

Other financial figures are equally as troubling. The University's investment income for 2002 was -$49 million, down from -$7 million in 2001 and sharply down from $85 million in 2000.

Lema was hired in June 2000 following a national search in the higher education community. She was the director of finance and technology at St. Paul's School in New Hampshire. Lema was touted as a perfect match because her previous job was so closely related to her job at the University. Lema decided to go in a different direction at the end of last semester and left abruptly in December.

Before Bucknell, Surgala was hired in January of 1999 by JPM when the company was at its pinnacle in creating a global cable assembly business. The company was negatively affected by the weakening in the telecommunications, technology and dot com industries. As a result, it filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection and is now operating as part of Sanmina-SCI, which will close its Lewisburg and Beaver Springs facilities by the end of March. The closings will affect 320 workers.

Surgala and whoever is hired to replace him on a full-time basis has a large and important role at the University, judging by all those who report to him. The departments at the University underneath the VPFA include business and finance, personnel, administrative and auxiliary services, and facilities.

The University's financial position, judging by the numbers published in the "Annual Report of Donors and Volunteers" now available in the Langone Center, is not nearly as strong as it was several years ago. According to the financial report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 2002, the University's endowment was $364 million. That figure was down sharply from 2001 when it was $428 million and 2000 when it was

Other financial figures are equally as troubling. The University's investment income for 2002 was -$49 million, down from -$7 million in 2001 and sharply down from $85 million in 2000. Operating expenses during the same period continued to rise. In 2002, they were $116 million, $109 million in 2001 and $103 million in 2000. All this would point to a certain weakening in the University's finances.

The administration maintains this will get better and that the financial position will strengthen as the market and economy begin to improve. This is a complicated matter and in the long run, most are confident the University will come back stronger from its current problems.

"I have not found any reason to believe that there ever were or are serious problems with the

Class of 2006 celebrates 3rd annual First Night

By Meghan Fox
Staff Writer

On Tuesday evening, the Class of 2006 gathered for the third annual celebration of First Night, the University's ceremonial recognition of first year students as having official Bucknell status.

The event began shortly after 7, as the first year class filled the pews of Rooke Chapel, partly unsure of what to expect.

"I didn't have high expectations going into it, but they [the class officers] kept it focused and to the point. I think they did a good job," Zoe Hamburger '06 said.

The first speaker of the night, Davis Flinchbaugh briefly described the importance of First Night and noted the bond that now links the Class of '06 with alumni and fellow Bucknellians.

Amy Badal, assistant dean of students, followed Flinchbaugh with congratulatory words, noting both the student's academic achievement and "incredible impact on campus."

With the theme from "Ghostbusters" echoing throughout the chapel, Paul Wolujewicz, class president, Kyle Mumford, vice president, and Joel Buckman, secretary and treasurer, strut down the center isle accompanied by a roar of laughter and applause.

Wolujewicz gave an enthusiastic greeting to the class of and then asked everyone to stand as the Reserve Officer Training Corp (ROTC) presented the American flag, the University's banner, and the class's newly designed crest.

The crest was designed with student input and collaboration among the officers and members of Bucknell Student Government (BSG).

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

First Year Students sang "Dear Bucknell" to President Rogers at his home during First Night on Tuesday.

The class motto was chosen first: "Our passion motivates, our knowledge changes the world."

The class colors and shield were then designed to reflect the motto.

"Our colors, red, silver and black represent the character of the class. The red represents the passion in which we change the world,- the silver represents our swiftness in doing so and the black represents, the permanence of our change," BSG R Amanda Roof said.

"Our motto is written in Latin representative because just as the Latin language is unchanging, so our motto and the determination it stands for will not change," said Scott Messenger, first member of BSG

In the center of the shield, a book was chosen to depict the collected knowledge the class possesses, and the flames of passion by which the class is inspired.

Marrara hired as Dean of fraternity and sorority affairs

Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

By Jaclyn Carr
Staff Writer

Lewis "Chip" Marrara became the new assistant dean of students for fraternity and sorority affairs this month.

Marrara replaced Roy Baker, the former dean of Greek life for six years, who retired from his position at the university at the end of last semester to become the vice president of student affairs at Catawba College in North Carolina.

Due to Marrara's previous experience with Greek life at other universities, many are looking forward to working with him.

"He is very careful, conscientious and approachable, which will help in communicating with those associated with the Greek system," Dean of Students Richard Ferraro.

Marrara was the coordinator of Greek life at the University of Georgia and also at Virginia Polytechnic Institute and Virginia State University.

Marrara attended East Stroudsburg University for his undergraduate education where he was a member of Theta Chi. He is presently working on his dissertation of male survivors of sexual assault for his Ph.D at Virginia Tech University.

As the assistant dean of students for the Greek life on the campus, Marrara will help with community service programs and will work with the fraternities and sororities to focus on the core values on which the Greek system was established.

"We should be getting back to what fraternities and sororities were founded on: community service, leadership and responsibility," Marrara said.

Marrara hopes to achieve this goal with The Plan for Prominence in Fraternity and Sorority Affairs that was developed in the fall of 1999 by the Greek Life Strategic Planning Steering Committee. The plan intends to promote the intellectual, social and ethical development of the members of the Greek system. Through certain initiatives such as the minimum GPA requirement of a 2.25 to remain a member of a fraternity or sorority and expanding community service programs, the plan's goal is for the Greek system to provide leadership and contribute to the campus community.

"We want to have a popular and fun, but also responsible, Greek system. And we want to create a situation where Greek life could be taken to the highest level," Ferraro said.

Borough Council elects Beattie as new Councilman

By Rachel Laskow
Senior Editor

The Borough Council elected Steven Beattie as the new Ward III representative at its December meeting. Beattie ran unopposed for the seat, which was vacant after Mayor Judy Wagner took on her new position. Beattie will serve on Council until Dec. 31, 2003, and will then have the option of running in the May primary election for the two-year Ward III seat.

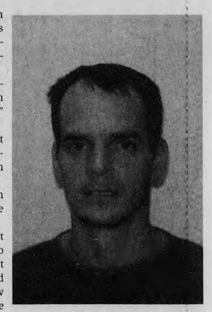
Beattie, a registered landscape architect and office manager for Light-Heigel's Lewisburg Area Office, moved to Lewisburg in 1998 and has been on the Borough's Planning Commission for three years. Beattie feels he has the experience that the Council needs.

Wagner is pleased to have Beattie on the Council.

"He will bring a whole new dimension to the Council," Wagner said.

As a Ward III representative, Beattie is representing many University students. Beattie favors students living off campus, but has some concerns as a Lewisburg resident.

According to Beattie, he always wanted to move to the Borough. He wanted to live in a place where he could walk downtown and his children would be able to play in Kidsburg. Beattie feels that his quality of life is affected by students moving in and out of downtown houses each year.



"It is hard to establish relationships with neighbors when they are moving every year," Beattie said.

Beattie is also concerned about the decreasing number of permanent residents in downtown Lewisburg.

"I want to do whatever I can to slow down the erosion," Beattie said.

Beattie does not believe that there is an all-knowing solution to the town-gown problems that affect the University and Lewisburg. He hopes that the new committee created to look at the idea of moving University students back on campus will offer some solutions.

Wagner also thinks that the new committee will give some insight and solutions.

"We are all trying to work together. I'm sure Steve will fit right in," Wagner said.

According to Beattie, the Planning Commission is currently looking at the zoning ordinance in the Borough. He hopes to provide a good dialogue between the Council and the Commission. Beattie also expects that the new committee will give advice to the Commission so that it knows what changes need to be made.

One idea Beattie has to alleviate the problem is to keep students in a more concentrated area of downtown. Beattie suggested keeping the students on the south side of Market Street and not letting them live past Seventh Street.

"Bucknell is beautiful and downtown is beautiful. Everything in between needs to be beautiful," Beattie said.

"From Bucknell, we will then take our knowledge to the four corners of the globe, represented by the four vines reaching from the book to the earth. In the next four years we will continue to acquire knowledge and nurture our various passions and leave Bucknell all the more capable of leading our generation and generations to come," Messenger said.

The book was additionally chosen as the focal point of the crest due to its personal significance to the Class of '06. As Wolujewicz announced, the theme of this class is the literacy campaign.

"This means that our class should strive to disseminate any branch of literacy possible. We have done a number of things so far. For instance, early on in the first semester, members of our class painted 39 bookshelves that were then donated to local headstart and day care centers. Also, using our class budget, we purchased about 15 books from the Literacy Tree, which gives underprivileged children some books that unfortunately, they may not be able to get, otherwise," Wolujewicz said.

Future plans and upcoming events for the Class of '06 were also discussed.

Mumford notified the class about an upcoming Valentine's Dance to be held on Feb. 15. Part of the proceeds of the dance would be put towards voice-activated software for David Van Wagener, a first year student who was recently paralyzed during a skiing accident over break.

Buckman informed the freshman class that this year's fundraiser would be the sale of underwear: boxers and thongs. Then he endorsed the fundraiser, saying, "You can't go wrong with a Bucknell thong!"

As part of the evening's events, a representative from each hall brought up 2 pages filled with pictures and memories to go in a collective scrapbook for the class.

"In three years, when we graduate, we have something to look back on from our freshman year, and when we come back for our reunion, we have it" Mumford said.

As each representative brought up their pages, the rest of their hall was to cheer.

"We have an outgoing class. We wanted them to yell and we wanted it to be fun," Wolujewicz said.

After the choir, consisting of all freshmen involved in vocal groups across campus—Concert Chorale, Rooke Chapel Choir, Gospel Choir, Bison Chips, Two Past Midnight, and Silhouettes, sang "Dear Bucknell," students were given glow sticks and led down illuminated paths to President Roger's house to present him with the book.

Students then received free T-shirts, mugs, cookies and hot chocolate.

"It was an excellent turnout from this first-year class. They displayed class unity and Bucknell pride," Badal said.

"It went every bit as well as we hoped!" Wolujewicz said

Leithner chosen as Financial Aid Director

By Chris Styers
Business and Politics Editor

At the conclusion of a selective, nationwide search, Andrea Leithner was chosen to assume the role of University director of financial aid.

As the Financial Aid Director, Leithner brings to this position a plethora of experience and a devotion to aiding students and their families in overcoming the obstacles and challenges of the financial aid process.

Leithner holds a bachelor of science degree in psychology from Vanderbilt University. Much of her life has been influenced by the college lifestyle, as her mother has been an administrator at Vanderbilt for many years. Her own college experiences and her years of exposure to the college scene helped her to discover her passion for the college environment.

Leithner said she felt more comfortable on a college campus than pursuing a career in private business. After working in the registrar's office at Vanderbilt, Leithner found her niche at the University of Oklahoma, where she became involved with financial aid. Before coming to the University, Leithner continued to develop her skill, serving in financial aid positions at Vanderbilt, Hamilton College and the University of Rochester.

"I like the contact with students and parents, and I enjoy being able to provide them with something as important as financial aid," Leithner said.

Leithner first became interested in the University position when she found it posted on the National Association of Financial Aid Administrators (NASFAA) Web site.

"I was attracted to Bucknell due to its excellent reputation, size and location," Leithner said.

When the position was posted, University President Steffen Rogers had a list of qualifications that would be most desirable in a candidate and would bring the most good to the University.

Rogers said the University desired someone who would make the process of financial aid "much more customer-friendly."

"The director would make the process more thoughtful, and would provide even more information to students and families than was requested," Rogers said. "Families need to feel Bucknell is doing everything possible to assist them in what is often a very complicated process."

Another qualification the candidate needed to possess was the ability to bring together the admissions and financial aid departments. Rogers said these two departments have been growing apart at institutions nationwide.

> "I had a feeling I would come here as soon as I drove onto campus for my interview. Many freshmen have that feeling about a place during their college searches. The feeling is one of comfort, fit and belonging, and I had it immediately."
> —Andrea Leithner, director of Financial Aid*

"Financial aid and admissions need to work more closely together," Rogers said. "It needs to be a seamless process for families."

When Leithner applied for the position, Rogers said she was "more than qualified."

Leithner's first experience with the University was not much unlike the experience of the applicants and their families that she would serve.

"I had a feeling I would come here as soon as I drove onto campus for my interview. Many freshmen have that feeling about a place during their college searches. . . . The feeling is one of comfort, fit and belonging, and I had it immediately," Leithner said.

Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

Leithner brings to the department and the University a number of goals and ideas that parallel the qualifications the University was searching for.

"I want to educate other offices as to what we do in financial aid, hopefully resolving some mystery and confusion that always seem to be prevalent about the field. Customer service is important to me, and even if it is already good, I feel that it can always be improved," Leithner said. "Money can be a difficult topic for families to discuss, and part of my job is to provide them with as much information as possible regarding aid so they can make informed decisions."

One of her immediate goals, and one she feels essential, is to be better acquainted with staff members and learn everything she can about the present workings of the financial aid office.

"Some things about financial aid are the same everywhere, but other issues can be exclusive to a particular school, so it pays to find out all I can," Leithner said.

In gathering this information and getting used to living in Lewisburg, Leithner said her exposure to the financial aid department and University community "has been wonderful—extremely warm and welcoming."

"The financial aid staff has been together for a long time and they brought me in just like I was an old friend. Financial aid people are of a different breed altogether, and I feel that I connected with the staff members from the very first meeting," Leithner said.

Many members of the campus community have gotten to know Leithner and understand the benefits her employment has already brought to the University.

"The Office of Financial Aid staff members are very pleased with the selection of Andrea as the financial aid director. She brings with her a very solid and knowledgeable background in financial aid, and much needed experience in the enrollment management setting," Associate Director of Financial Aid Ray Randall said.

"We are glad to have her," said Rogers. "She has done a wonderful job and has already convinced us we made the right decision."

Leithner said she is excited to be a part of the campus community and able to pursue helping students and families in the financial aid process.

"Coming to a new place can be both challenging and a little scary, but less so if you know you have made the right decision. I know I have," Leithner said.

Bucknell Community Mourns Losses

Richard Iskandar '03

By Rob Schmicker
Contributing Writer

Too often when we lose a loved one, we say that he or she will truly be missed because he or she was a great person. I can say for sure that this is true about Richard George Iskandar '03. I had known Richie since our first year when we both lived on Roberts 3 East. As all first year students experience, it took a while for us to get over the jitters that come along with moving away from home and those we love. At first, I just knew him as the kid who was building his own computer (now honestly, who does that?). Soon, though, it became evident that he was about so much more.

My hallmates and I soon found about his failing kidneys and the need for dialysis, to which a person's typical reaction should be pity and remorse. But Richie made it difficult for us to feel sorry for him; he had more life in him than any person I know. Conversations became livelier when he entered the room and he never had negative things to say about anyone. My roommate, Mike Fowler '02, and I always tried to get him riled up so that we could hear him utter a swear word, but to his death, one never came out of his mouth. As a senior, I remember one time when he was pretty upset at some people in his education class. He told us that he was going to give them a piece of his mind next time they did something stupid. I remember thinking, "what are you going to do Rich? Tell them that they are not a nice person?" That was the extent of his insult and contempt for others. He simply loved life and all of God's creatures too much.

As sophomores, we lived in Vedder Hall together and this was really the time that Mike, Rich and I became very close. Whenever we had a problem, we could talk to Richie and somehow he was able to put it in perspective because of his wonderful understanding of life. He was an amazing listener and friend.

Most importantly, Richie was a fighter. He was a fighter every day that I knew him, and he fought up until his death. Rich never accepted any help from Mike or me because he didn't want us to be bothered. We would tell him to call us if he needed help with anything or if he wasn't feeling well. A few days would go by without hearing from him, and we would then learn that he just got back from the hospital. So Richie wouldn't worry us, he wouldn't even tell us until he got back.

Rob Schmicker '02

Richard Iskandar '03(left) and Rob Schmicker '02 met during freshman year. Rob said he will always remember Richard's loving personality.

When we walked somewhere on campus and Rich was slacking behind, he would blame it on him being tired; that he had stayed up all night long. But we knew he was just not feeling well because of his kidney problems. He would never admit to it.

That instinct even carried over into his daily life. For those of you who know Rich, you know just exactly how loud he can be when he talks. As a sophomore, he would scream into the phone in Arabic while talking to his mother. We would tell him, "Geez Rich, lower your voice. You're going to piss off the football players next door." His response would be, "They know where I am if they want to start with me." I have heard that line so many times and to this day it makes me smile. After all, who was ever going to start with Richie? Not only was he too nice to start with, but he was so tiny that no one would do anything to him.

When I visited him in the hospital, I was pretty shaken up, but I knew that he would never stop fighting. Even though he was at peace with what would ultimately happen to him, there was no way he would go down without a fight. His passing has made me question my faith in God, but I know that Rich is going to a better place and that God has some greater plan for this amazing person. I feel cheated that I was unable to graduate with Rich last May. I feel even more cheated that I won't be able to see him graduate next January, and that I won't be able to bring my kids to see Dr. Rich when they are sick. But I feel that the entire world is being cheated by Rich's death. Every person that he has met or had some influence on is now a better person. In a world filled with sin, Rich was as pure of a human being as they come. I will miss him, but I know he will be looking down on me in the future. I can only hope to lead my life in a way that he can be proud of.

We miss you Rich. You are our friend for life and we love you. Until we meet again, may you rest in peace.

A memorial service will be held Sunday in Rooke Chapel at 2 p.m.

Danna Frangione

By Michelle Dombeck
Managing Editor

Associate Professor of Theatre and Dance Danna Frangione, passed away on Dec. 5. A memorial service was held in her honor last Saturday.

Over 200 people, including relatives, colleagues and students, attended the memorial service, "Remembrance and Celebration," on Saturday. During the service, the focus was on remembering the goodness and joy Frangione brought into people's lives.

Frangione's husband, Bob, spoke during the service and shared many anecdotes about their life together. Frangione was normally a very shy person, he said, but on stage, she was anything but shy. Dance brought out the best in her, and she wanted to bring out the best in dance.

"She had the desire to celebrate in dance the best in man," said Star Herrmann, mother of Ryen Herrmann '02, a University dance student.

In the service, Star Herrmann also said how Frangione met her death with a certain sense of humor. Upon seeing a picture of the cancerous tumor that was growing in her abdomen, Frangione told Ryen Herrmann that it looked oddly like a turkey.

Frangione's youngest son, Nick, choreographed a dance to be performed in his mother's honor. This dance, "Our Lives Together," was set to Hootie and the Blowfish's "Time." Stephanie Yezek '03 and Vanessa Hull '04 performed it in the service.

"The main thing I remember about Danna Frangione, aside from her little sayings, like 'Not so much' and 'piddle,' was her always saying 'I hope you all have found some degree of love in your lives.' Loss is such a difficult thing, but it truly puts things in perspective," Yezek said. "And as I danced for Danna on Saturday, I felt she gave me that gift; she gave all of us there the most wonderful gift of love."

Frangione's colleagues also felt that she had a tremendous impact on their lives.

"Danna was the most loving and caring person I knew. We worked together, danced together and choreographed together for eight years," Associate Professor of Theater Er-Dong Hu said. "She was my colleague and my friend. The extent of her impact on my life is immeasurable, and if not for her influence, i would not be who I am today."

In addition to Frangione's wonderful personality, she also was a talented dancer and choreographer. Hired as the Univeristy's first director of dance, she shaped the program.

"In her 14 years as director of the dance program, Danna facilitated the renovation of Tustin Gym into a magnificent dance studio … designed and guided the successful implementation of a dance minor degree (which soundly balances theory and practice), served as the artistic director of 26 Bucknell Dance Company concerts and introduced the studio concert and choreographer's showcase as new dance venues," said Bob Gainer, associate professor of dance.

Frangione also added to the University's curriculum.

"Danna even made time to develop and contribute two new stimulating courses to Bucknell's Common Learning Agenda: a foundation seminar entitled 'The Artist's Guide to the Body,' and a capstone seminar celebrating one of her passions, 'World Fusion Dance,' " Gainer said.

University President Steffen Rogers thought of Frangione as a person who knew about the beauty in life.

"Danna was a very special faculty member completely dedicated to her students and her profession," Rogers said. "In my limited encounters with her, she saw the world as a place to dance. Wouldn't it be a wonder to see the world in that light?"

Lee Cromwell '05, a student of Frangione's, also feels that Frangione was dedicated to and passionate about her work.

"She had very powerful feelings about dance, which her students picked up. I think Bucknell will have a difficult, if not impossible challenge, in finding someone with as much passion and vitality as she had," Cromwell said. "She put every piece of herself into dance and I think that that is a very special gift she which she leaves this to University."

Prior to joining the University in 1987, Frangione taught at the University of Georgia, the University of Mississippi and South Dakota State University. Several of her colleagues from Georgia attended the memorial service.

"Danna was a poet," said Peggy Thrasher Law, whom Frangione taught while at the University of Georgia. "Her language was movement."

Even though Frangione is no longer creating poetry, her work and influence will live on. Draheim, who once worked in the Department of Theater and Dance as the lighting and technical director, e-mailed Frangione just one day before she died.Gainer shared his words at the service.

"The dance is over, but the movement will never be forgotten," Draheim wrote.

John Wilkins '80

By Jennifer Jenchura
Senior Writer

John Wilkins '80, employed at the University for the past eight years as a Systems Integrator for Information Services and Resources (ISR), passed away on Jan. 13 after a 14-year battle with cancer. During his Bucknell tenure, Wilkins' talents as a cryptography expert, security professional, programmer and UNIX system administrator were significant assets both to ISR and to his colleagues.

"Wilkins has a long history at Bucknell, both as a student and as a member of the staff. In his work life, John spent a great deal of his time working on large systems that work behind the scenes in ISR. Our use of the dial-in modems, e-mail, listserv lists, Web services and Banner all depended on John's careful attention. He was also one of our primary security experts," Associate Vice President for Information Services and Resources and Wilkins' ISR colleague Gene Spencer said.

Although Wilkins was unable to come to the office during much of his last year, he continued to do productive work from home.

"His unique and exceptional combination of personality, technical skills, creative intellect and interests was something that I'll always remember fondly and most likely will be a standard against which I'll unintentionally compare all other of my close colleagues in the future" ISR Systems Integrator Chris Weber said. "Our brainstorming sessions and technical discussions, non-work-related conversations, projects we shared, the constant bloom of humor in the office, and our easy relationship combined into something that, frankly, was my primary source of job satisfaction during John's term of employment here."

For the nine years prior to his returning to Bucknell as an employee, Wilkins was an advisory engineer to IBM's Cryptography Center of Competence in Manassas, VA. While there, he was named as an inventor in 18 patents in the areas of data security, multimedia copy protection and network analysis. Wilkins was also the founder and owner of Petra Security Architects, a consulting firm for computer and network security and a founder and co-owner of WellChildForms, Inc., an Internet company providing customized well-child forms to pediatricians and family physicians.

"[Even more important than his work life], John was a member of our family. He cared deeply about his colleagues and earned our deepest respect in return. He was an amazing man, and we will miss him terribly, although we are delighted that his struggle with cancer has finally ended," Spencer said.

An amateur radio operator for over a decade, Wilkins enjoyed running, biking, hiking and cross-country skiing while he was able. Wilkins was an active member of the Mifflinburg Christian and Missionary Alliance Church.

"John was an active participant in Bucknell's Christian community and he and his family often opened their home to many students from that community. I've heard many stories of groups of students meeting at their house to share a meal, share fellowship and escape the campus for just a little bit," Spencer said.

According to friends, Wilkins was always willing to share his considerable knowledge, ideas, and well-considered opinions with anyone who might ask.

"Those who knew John will remember him for his uncommon and quiet courage, great faith, capable intellect and welcome wit," Weber said.

Million Penny Project declared a success

Greek organizations and student body donate over $10,000 to the United Way

By Jeff Day
Staff Writer

A million smiles, a million individuals, a million pennies; whatever the item, acquiring a million of it is certainly no easy task. This year, the University actively participated in the Million Penny Project, in which the contributions would be donated to the 2002 Union County United Way campaign.

The Million Penny Project, under the leadership of Janet Serafin '04 and Evan Gropper '04, was designed to challenge each Greek organization to raise $500 which would total a million pennies, or $10,000.

"I am proud to say that the project was very successful this year. Everyone worked well together, which made the project a success," Serafin said.

> "We raised the desired amount of $10,000 and got a lot of people involved and aware that Greeks are doing something positive and making a difference-
> —Evan Gropper '04

The University's Greek organizations and student body combined to donate $11,213 to the United Way campaign. Among the student groups that helped to support the campaign included the men's basketball team, women's softball team, women's crew team, freshman, sophomore, junior and senior classes, the third floor Larison Cottage hall group and the McDonnell fourth floor NW hall group.

"I see a bright future for society when college students, the leaders of tomorrow, engage so energetically in philanthropic ventures," Charles Root, President of the Union County United Way said.

In accordance with the United Way's theme "Neighbors Helping Neighbors," the University was able to unify in a desire to achieve a common goal that would simply benefit others in the community. In fact, it is estimated that over 60 percent of the student body participated in the events.

Besides the financial goals, the project also wanted to show the community and other skeptics that the Greek organizations are more than simply party houses.

"We raised the desired amount of $10,000 and got a lot of people involved and aware that Greeks are doing something positive and making a difference," Gropper said.

Kari Conrad, associate dean of students and director of campus activities and programs, coordinated the student participation in this year's campaign. She said that everyone did a fantastic job in contributing to the project's goals, and helped to establish a record year for student contributions.

According toConrad, Gropper, Serafin and herself will to present a check for $11,213 to the United Way at the home basketball game today.

"It is very important to make such a presentation because they [Greeks and student organizations] worked so hard for this event, and it would be great to give them the recognition they deserve," Conrad said.

According to Gropper, each year, a different charity is chosen to be the recipient of the funds contributed by the school. This year, the Union County United Way was chosen for two reasons. First, the leaders of the project wanted to see the money stay in the local community this year. Secondly, in working with the administration in the University-wide United Way Campaign, Greek relationships with the administration were bound to improve.

In the end, the campaign's success is due to the leadership of Gropper, Serafin and Conrad, along with the hard work and contributions by Greek and student body organizations.

"I would want to encourage people to be more active and work with ACE and the CAP center," Gropper said.

Kidnappers return Bucky the Bison

Stuffed bison returned home to Admissions seven months after his disappearance

By Meghan Fox
Staff Writer

A small stuffed bison purchased in the University's Bookstore attracted national publicity when he traveled across the United States and ventured as far east as Europe and Africa.

"Bucky the Bison," as the stuffed animal is affectionately called, was purchased a few years ago by the Admissions Department as a morale booster and an unofficial mascot.

Lois Purcell, assistant to the dean of students, explained that Bucky's function was to circulate throughout the offices as a reward for jobs well done. But since his adoption by the Admissions Department, Bucky has disappeared three times.

In January 1999, Bucky mysteriously vanished from Purcell's desk. A ransom note followed.

"He had been kidnapped," Purcell said. "The note asked for a few dozen cookies."

A plate full of cookies was left in the lobby overnight, and in the morning, Bucky found his way back to his home in Admissions.

Pam Glass, admissions services coordinator, wanted to protect Bucky from future kidnappings. A locked closet door could not keep Bucky from leaving the University.

Bucky's second disappearance was self-motivated.

"He was in search of love," Purcell said.

This time, Bucky returned to campus on Valentine's Day with his new-found sweetheart, Becky, a smaller stuffed bison.

Somehow this journey did not fulfill his desire for traveling. In March 2002, Bucky left the security of campus to discover the world.

Over the next couple of months, Bucky would travel across the country, visit his friends at the Kentucky Derby and go sight-seeing in Washington D.C. Bucky would venture as far as the Carribbean, France and Kenya.

But for each location he visited, Bucky would send Purcell a postcard or letter, signed and personalized by his hoof print, and an occasional e-mail from BuckytheBison@hotmail.com. Each postcard was written in different handwriting, and each contained a different postmarking address.

On Nov. 8, the Friday before Homecoming, Purcell received a phone call from the switchboard informing her that she had a package waiting. To her delight, the package was Bucky, now clad in hiking boots and a straw hat, and holding a sign that read "Bucknell Admissions or Bust!"

Bucky's travels claimed the interest of reporters throughout the nation, who published Bucky's account in their newspapers.

To this day, the original kidnapper has yet to be identified.

"Everyone's a suspect. I'm sure it was someone in the office," Purcell said.

However, Purcell admitted that the whole ordeal was enjoyable for everyone, adding some excitement to the typical workday.

"I think probably he'll hang around for a while until something dramatic occurs," Purcell said.

BSG ELECTIONS

ening of the committees and updating the Web site were discussed.

According to Pusty, the Web site will be updated weekly.

"It was nice to see fresh faces at the meeting," Britz said. "It looks like we're going to have a very optimistic, organized planning board. They all seem very enthusiastic and I am looking forward to working with them."

There are seven BSG committees that meet weekly.

"We are trying to make representation better on campus," said Britz. "People don't know what we do, but we are constantly trying to improve student life."

Pusty said a primary goal is to develop a better relationship with the student body.

"I am completely open to any suggestions that students have because that is how we are going to improve things. I have mandatory weekly office hours where anyone is able to come and speak to me about any concerns that they might have," Pusty said.

Timer agreed that stronger representation and a better relationship with the students needs to be established.

> "I am completely open to any suggestions that students have because that is how we are going to improve things."
> —Jennifer Pusty '05

"Without a doubt I would like to develop a better relationship with the student body. I would like students to know more about what BSG does and how we can serve them. I think reaching out with the letter to leaders on campus will be one step in the direction of developing that relationship. In my position of student body president, I think the word 'student' is the most important part because without them, who am I working for?" Timer said .

"The more visible on campus BSG is, the more students BSG will be able to engage. The more students BSG engages, the more ideas BSG will hear on students' issues. The more ideas BSG hears, the better BSG's collective decisions will be. And that is what it is all about: BSG, making good decisions for Bucknell Students," Phillips said.

to scholars and one of our finest teachers," Rogers said.

Hardt spoke of Sojka as the ideal for University athletes, mentioning Sojka's athletic talent, as well as his encouragement of student athletes.

"As many of you know Professor Sojka was a Hall of Fame scholar-athlete in his days at Coe College and he maintains his well-deserved reputation as a fiery competitor. Dr. Sojka has long been an advocate and enthusiastic supporter of Bucknell's scholar-athlete model, and in many ways his own achievements epitomize this lofty ideal, so it is only appropriate that this marvelous new facility be named in honor of this extraordinary man," Hardt said.

Sojka served as University president for 11 years. In 1995, he returned to teaching as a full-time member of the faculty. He is the University's NCAA faculty athletics representative and had been a member of the NCAA President's Council.

The Sojka Pavilion will replace Davis Gym as venue for both the men's and women's varsity basketball teams. Davis Gym was home to basketball for 64 years. Some of its features are the clear vantage points from the seating and "walk-down" access to seats. Retractable seats also provide more floor room for a practice space large enough for three basketball courts.

Rusnak '86 sentenced for trading scheme

University alum John Rusnak '86 was sentenced for a trading scandal in which he lost $691.2 million at Allfirst Financial Inc. Rusnak faces a jail term of seven and a half years in a federal prison.

John Rusnak '86, a former trader at Baltimore's Allfirst Financial Inc., was sentenced last Friday to seven-and-a-half years in prison for devising a currency-trading scheme that brought down Allfirst Financial Inc. According to The Baltimore Sun, he was responsible for $691.3 million in losses.

Rusnak, 38, will remain on probation for five years after he is released from prison and will have to pay $1,000 a month during those five years. He will also have to make the $691.3 million in restitution. According to the Associated Press, prosecutors said the amount Rusnak pays back depends on how much income he earns after he is released.

Rusnak faced a maximum sentence of 30 years in prison and a $1 million fine on the banking charge.

"Obviously, this is an exceptional case," U.S. District Court Judge William N. Nickerson said to The Baltimore Sun.

During the hearings, Rusnak accepted full responsibility for his actions and apologized.

According to The Baltimore Sun, Karen Weiss, an Allfirst senior vice president in healthcare banking, opposed the sentence during the hearing.

"This is a personal issue for a lot of us. I don't think [the sentence] is sufficient. I'm glad he's going to pay the price, but the price isn't high enough," Weiss said to The Sun after the hearing.

Rusnak must report to prison by Feb. 18. According to The Baltimore Sun, Rusnak's attorney David B. Irwin recommended that he be sent to federal prison in Fort Dix, N.J.

Rusnak majored in economics at the University and made the Dean's List twice. After graduating from the University, Rusnak worked at First Fidelity Bank in Philadelphia and in 1989 he worked for the foreign exchange division at Chemical Bank in New York. In 1993, Rusnak became a currency trader at the First National Bank, now known as Allfirst.

operating budget deficits is very serious and must be addressed, the University's balance sheet and net asset position continue to be strong. Unfortunately, our position was stronger prior to the poor performance in the stock market the past few years, but the University's financial underpinnings are still very solid," Surgala said

The University is experiencing some budgetary issues but they are "mostly the result of less spendable endowment income and higher operating expenses. The revenue shortfall is due to the decline in the value of the endowment and the higher operating costs are principally due to the operating and maintenance costs of new buildings," Surgala said

Asked whether the University may have been too ambitious in pursuing physical plant expansion in a tough environment, Surgala said, "My sense is no one approved expenditures for facilities with the knowledge that it was not a financially sound path to travel. I think that when decisions were made it was with the best intentions to pay for the construction and to address the operating and maintenance costs through continued growth in endowment related income. However, intentions do not pay the bills."

University President Steffen Rogers agrees that the University's building boom and market downturn may have set the University back in the near term.

"We did lots [of construction] in a short amount of time and it did not take much of the market's downturn to take its toll." Rodgers added that "we were going through a time several years ago when we could afford lots of things and went ahead to build many of the new buildings on campus."

However, as Surgala points out, the University maintains "wonderful facilities and services in which we all take pride. Our challenge is to responsibly reduce expenditures yet limit the negative affect those actions might have on the quality of maintenance and service."

Rogers is confident that Surgala will do a great job in helping the University.

"We were fortunate to have someone with his level of expertise in the area [who could come in and help us this fast]," said Rogers. "This is a great opportunity for the University to step back and reexamine everything it is doing."

He also added that the new Recreation and Athletics Center will be a positive addition to the University physical plant. It is a great recruiting tool for strong student athletes and all students will use it heavily. Rogers does acknowledge that near-term it is an expensive building.

"It reminds me of when you get your first mortgage on a house. At first, you think 'how am I going to pay for this?' After a while, it will all work out and you don't have to think about it any more."

The University is currently conducting a nationwide search for a full-time vice president for finance and administration. Robert Kallin, Vice President for Development and University Relations, is heading the search committee and, for the first time, the University is looking both at higher education candidates and private sector candidates. This would mark a change in the University's tendency to hire higher education candidates. The search will last as long as necessary to yield a hire.

Students strengthen University family

Over the past few months, the student body has suffered several tragedies that have tested its strength as a community. Dealing with the death of Richard Iskandar '03 and the shock of learning that David Van Wagener '06 was paralyzed from a skiing accident, a hobby shared by many students, University students have emerged stronger and have further demonstrated the existence of the Bucknell family.

If the student body was anything less than a family, its members would not have turned to those around them for comforting embraces during the Sept. 11 "Remembrance, Reflection, Renewal" commemoration ceremony. Even when not overwhelmed by strife, the University comes together. Sojka Pavilion opened to a full house in support of student-athletes, a beloved professor and a highly-anticipated building that has been the blood, sweat and tears of the University for the last two years, just as the student body has come together in indestructible support of its peers.

When Iskandar's kidney condition took a dramatic turn for the worse early in December, the Middle Eastern Student Association and Fellowship of Christian Athletes organized students to accompany Iskandar's family by his bedside throughout his stay at the hospital. Students rallied around Iskandar and credited their strength to a faith devoid of religious denominations, political ideals or race, relying on one another to help cope with the anguish of losing a fellow student and friend.

This Sunday, students will have the opportunity to formally say goodbye to Iskandar at a memorial service in Rooke Chapel at 2 p.m., but his impact on students will live on in the Class of 2003. According to Dean of Students Richard Ferraro, Iskandar will still graduate with his class in May.

After learning that Van Wagener was hospitalized from a debilitating skiing accident over winter break, the Class of 2006, led by its Bucknell Student Government representatives, immediately began a project to extend the spirit of its class and the University to Von Wagener by sending cards and University memorabilia to decorate his hospital room. The class also signed a banner at its First Night celebration last Tuesday to send to Von Wagener, and a dance has been scheduled in which all proceeds will be donated to facilitate Von Wagener's return.

The efforts of the Class of 2006 are a credit to its ability to so quickly forge close friendships and acclimate itself to the University. After attending the University for only one semester, Van Wagener is in the thoughts of the family that is very anxious to welcome him home.

The Bucknellian Editorial Board expresses its condolences to the friends and family of Iskandar and is hopeful for Van Wagener's expedient recovery.

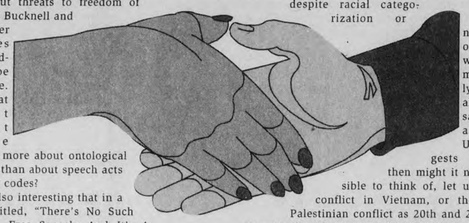
Solidarity resolves speech conflict

To the Editor:

The ongoing discussions in The Bucknellian and elsewhere about freedom of speech, the perceived threat of university speech codes, etc. have prompted me to make these brief comments. Although perhaps coincidental, it is interesting to me that the particular incidents which have generated so much concern about threats to freedom of speech at Bucknell and at other campuses have tended to be about race. To what extent might these issues be more about ontological freedoms than about speech acts or speech codes?



It is also interesting that in a work entitled, "There's No Such Thing As Free Speech: And It's A Good Thing, Too (OUP)," author Stanley Fish convincingly demonstrates that threats to freedom of speech, and breaches of this constitutionally guaranteed freedom have always been dealt with on the merit of each case. In other words, he concludes that the notion that a putative threat to freedom anywhere is a threat to freedom everywhere is patently false. Indeed, he argues persuasively that speech (as an intelligible act) and its freedoms (as socially sanctioned speech acts) can only exist against restrictions and limitations.

Although perhaps coincidental, it is interesting to me that the particular incidents which have generated so much concern about threats to freedom of speech at Bucknell and at other campuses have tended to be about race.

I don't want to do a grave injustice to Fish's careful analysis by indulging in a vulgar synopsis of his argument in this brief commentary. However, what I want to ask (rhetorically) against the background of Fish's position that a perceived threat to freedom of speech in a particular context is not automatically a threat to the concept of freedom of speech, is: "What are the socio-political and ideological ramifications of sanctioning a white person's perceived right to wear "blackface" in public, or his perceived right to say, 'What's up my Negro!' to a black person?"

Finally (apropos of comments attributed to the recent David Horowitz lecture, as reported in The Bucknellian), if we suspend disbelief for a moment and imagine that we are all fundamentally the same despite racial categorization or national origin—if we imagine momentarily that we all want the same thing, as Black Uhuru suggests in song, then might it not be possible to think of, let us say, the conflict in Vietnam, or the ongoing Palestinian conflict as 20th and 21st century anti-colonial struggles, in addition to being conflicts about communism and terrorism? Has the movement of the centuries so fundamentally changed us as beings in society that what groups of people wanted and achieved in the 18th and 19th centuries remains inconceivable now as the desire of other groups in the 20th and 21st centuries?

It seems to me that these issues are part of a historical undercurrent that is much too complex and dangerous to be meaningfully examined and explained by simplistic binarist appeals to freedom versus unfreedom, liberal versus conservative, citizen versus terrorist, good versus evil. Such vulgar hermeneutics makes good television and newsprint, but it produces more conflict than it resolves. Thus, with Black Uhuru I sing, "Solidarity."

Sincerely,
Glyne Griffith,
Associate Professor of English

Defenders of free speech

To the Editor:

Bucknellian columnist Aaron Hanlon and a number of the other Conservatives Club (BUCC) propagandists consistently do "liberals" a disservice: in the context of free speech and the regulation of such speech, it is both unfair and inaccurate to paint liberals as ardent supporters of speech codes and conservatives as the ironwilled defenders of this right. As someone who falls within this evidently monolithic and majority group of leftists, believe me, these intimations constitute a gross misstatement in light of the increasingly conservative politics in the United States. I have grown accustomed to hearing the liberals, especially in my conservative Virginia town, skewered as supporters of the ACLU, enemies of God in the classrooms and supporters of flag burning.

If the BUCC and "The Counterweight" wish to paint themselves as defenders of free speech, I cannot fault them. I do, however, hope that they prove to be more than fairweather friends.

An open-minded assessment reveals this to be a case of the pot calling the kettle black. I, along with many others, fear the horrifying speech-limiting and privacy ignoring actions of Attorney General John Ashcroft and others of this ilk. This man is the poster boy for the curtailing of civil liberties; this man is distinctly not a liberal. With respect to his actions, the lessons of 1984 ring all too clearly in my ears.

If the BUCC and "The Counterweight" wish to paint themselves as defenders of free speech, I cannot fault them. I do, however, hope that they prove to be more than fairweather friends. Having successfully milked national coverage to their cause, I would be heartened to see that America's newest free-speech advocates stay the course that we, the defenders of the ACLU and other such organizations, have been paving for decades. But, for the sake of accuracy and responsible journalism, recognize that this speech-limiting streak runs through both liberal and conservative ideologies.

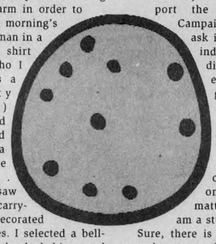
Sincerely,
Denis Kennedy '05

It's the little things

To the Editor:

At around 10pm on Monday night during finals, I was sprawled out on a couch on Lower Level 2 of the Bertrand, elbow deep in Comparative Politics studying, with a sign next to me that said "Please wake me up if I'm asleep". I have to admit, my motivation was fading fast.

While I contemplated chewing off my right arm in order to avoid the next morning's final, a gentleman in a button down shirt and a tie (who I recognized as a University employee) approached me. "Would you like a cookie?" He asked. Astonished, I saw that he was carrying a tray of decorated holiday cookies. I selected a bell-shaped one, thanked him, and watched as he continued to the next student within sight.



Earlier that day, I awoke to find that the custodian for the first floor of Vedder, Betty, had left a holiday card for the hall, and a small gift for each of us. After a semester of filling the hall with glitter, puffy paint, overflowing garbage cans, and general mess, I'm not sure what we've done to deserve a gift.

I guess that's my point. Maybe we don't deserve these gifts. At the very least, we tend to forget about them sometimes. It's a little too easy to get caught up in the petty disputes on campus and overlook the little things.

In order to get these gifts, no one asked if I am a conservative or a liberal. They didn't ask if I support the Living Wage Campaign. They didn't ask if I am greek or independent. They didn't ask for my ethnic background or my family's income. They didn't ask my how I feel about diversity on campus. The only thing that mattered is that I am a student.

Sure, there is a lot of debate around campus about some very serious issues. Don't get me wrong; I'm not saying that cookies in the library can solve all of our problems. It's just possible that sometimes we have to look past our differences and appreciate the little things.

Sincerely,
Janet Serafin '04

Michigan admissions misses diversity

By Michael Boland
Senior Writer

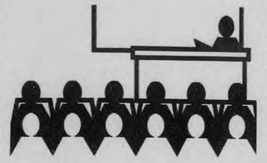
The 14th Amendment guarantees that "No state shall ... deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." On its face, this language seems impossible to reconcile with a state-sponsored system of racial preferences, no matter the context and no matter the beneficiary.

But courts have ruled that like the First and Second Amendments, the 14th Amendment is not absolute. They have permitted the government to consider race under certain circumstances, but have stipulated that such usage will be subject to "strict scrutiny" by the courts.

In order to survive strict scrutiny, the government must show two things: that it considers race in pursuit of some "compelling" government objective, and that its usage is "narrowly tailored" toward achieving that objective. Very few government interests have been judged "compelling"; this privileged status has been reserved for things like maintaining national security, or correcting the vestiges of racial discrimination.

In defending its use of racial preferences in admissions, the University of Michigan argues that it has discovered a new "compelling" interest, the need for "diversity" in the classroom. As most people know, the Supreme Court will rule on the Michigan case this spring. And it will strike the program down.

The fatal flaw in Michigan's program is that it does nothing to ensure any sort of meaningful diversity. Perhaps there is something to be said for having various perspectives in a classroom, but affirmative action in the form of racial preferences does nothing to guarantee a variety of "perspectives." As practiced at Michigan and most universities, it enhances applicants' chances for admission based on the color of their skin without considering whether that applicant in fact brings something to the classroom that enriches the discussion.



A brief filed by the Center for Equal Opportunity argues, "Greater diversity might lead to exposure to people with different ideas or backgrounds, but it is very dubious to use race as a proxy for anticipating individuals' thoughts and experiences."

There are few ideas or experiences that only members of a particular racial group can have, and fewer still that all members of that group will share. In sum, racial diversity cannot be equated with actual viewpoint diversity."

Justice O'Connor got it right in Metro Broadcasting v. FCC: "Social scientists may debate how peoples' thoughts and behavior reflect their background, but the Constitution provides that the government may not allocate benefits and burdens among individuals based on the assumption that race or ethnicity determines how they act or think."

To argue that "all blacks are X, or that all Hispanics are Y, and we need a certain measure of X and Y in each classroom to improve everyone's education," fails to account for the wide range of experiences and viewpoints within each of these communities. If all blacks are X, then just what is X? Likewise, can you think of a word or quality that describes every Hispanic? There isn't one.

If the state had a compelling interest in maintaining the "right" melanin count in its classrooms, then racial preferences would be just the ticket. But it doesn't, since (hopefully) the University of Michigan values a student for what's on the inside, not the outside. The narrow, legalistic question of whether diversity is a "compelling" government interest is moot. The University of Michigan has shown no interest in building a substantively, functionally "diverse" student body. If that were the goal, then anarchists, Marxists, fascists and cannibals would be given preference regardless of their heritage. They are not.

Michigan's system of racial preferences—in no way tailored to achieve its stated purpose of insuring meaningful diversity within the student body—amounts to little more than discrimination for its own sake, and fails the "damn good reason" test the 14th Amendment so wisely requires.

President Bush's progressive tax cut plan

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

Like U.S. President George W. Bush understands the utility in striking down an enemy force before it attacks you, I feel obligated to defend the Bush tax plan before any campus criticisms are launched. Predictably, the entirety of such critiques will engage the exhausted line of class warfare argument. Boring!

Not only are such arguments demonstrably false, their perceived intentions of helping the poor are manifestly backwards. If you happen to be unfortunate enough to ever hear one of your friends, professors or any other sad soul robotically reiterate the sound bite that starts like, "These tax cuts are directed towards the wealthiest ..." it would be in the best of both your interests to inform that person that the reason his or her love life is so mundane may have to do with Sen. Tom Daschle (D S.D.) impressions being so decidedly unsexy. These class warriors are the same people who bemoaned the corporate Enron-style scandals as implications of the shortcomings of capitalism. But are they truly interested in reform?

If these guys are serious about serving the poor and helping ensure against future corporate accounting scandals, they should support Bush's economic plan.

While I'm certain the tax cut package will have a tremendously beneficial impact on the economy, I believe it may have one deficiency: it's too progressive. Redistributionist liberals—or, modern day Robin Hoods, if you will—have already evidenced their inability to observe that the biggest cuts are aimed at the lowest earning. And, they will certainly believe my contention—tax cuts for the rich are the best remedy for the poor—makes as much sense as the earth being flat. Yet, this is how it is. If socialism held the answers to a more perfect society, I would be a socialist; but alas, it does not. The best welfare program is a strong economy, so it naturally follows that the saviors to the destitute are those possessing the key to economic growth. Fiscal conservatives, simply put, hold this key.

The metaphorical engine of our economy is, as I'm pretty sure all agree, the collective force of individuals in a market system. Private competition powers free enterprise, which gives companies the ability to collect revenue and distribute jobs. The lesser the amount the government involves itself in this process, the more productive the economy is. It's no surprise that the governments with higher degrees of economic freedom (few barriers to trade, minimal regulations, low taxes, etc.) in turn receive higher proportions of revenues.

This can be seen on varying scales, whether it be international, state or even local—no matter where private people and companies are able to freely choose where to do business—that locale is duly rewarded with increased tax receipts. The people, rich and poor, are the benefactors from an improved economy. Economic growth equates to more jobs and higher wages. Bush's economic plan will act as a sort of steroid for the currently moderately muscled economy.

So why doesn't everyone accept this notion of minimal government intrusion? After all, if Democrats love spending federal funds, shouldn't they accept the doctrine of the Laffer Curve, which observes there's an optimal level of taxation at which the government takes in the highest revenues? Perhaps they would, if they viewed liberty as approvingly as they do abortion. Our tax code is inarguably quite the debacle. This evolves from its work-in-progress dynamic. No congressional session is complete without amending it in some fashion. It's become so insanely complex and unending, you're reminded of a recent example of how chaotic it truly is. In an attempt to gauge how well it's actually understood, a figurative family prototype was created, standard in orientation. This scenario was then given to four leading tax filing agencies where it was prepared as if it were a real return. Long story short: only one firm was able to perform the task correctly.

What's more troubling is that the IRS doesn't even fully understand it. It seems clear there's a problem when both the professional preparers and the collectors themselves cannot keep up with this difficult code. Thus, tax code simplification and reduction are favorable at every instance—a flat tax being the highest ideal.

Bush's economic plan is three-pronged. It seeks to spark economic growth through increased consumer spending; encourage investment by both individuals and businesses and deliver help to the unemployed. These goals are sought in a few different ways. The incrementally phased in 2001 tax cuts will be hastened. Job-creating investment will spur from the ending of the double taxation of corporate dividends. Along with financial handouts, new jobs will become available to the unemployed. According to a projection by the Council of Economic Advisers, the president's plan will help the economy to create 2.1 million jobs over the next three years.

The two lowest-tiered income earning groups—0-$30,000 and $30,000 to $40,000—will have to pay 18.5 percent less, on average, in income taxes under the plan. This is opposed to an 11.5 percent reduction for earners of $100,000 and above. "The richest one percent," I don't think so. When former President Ronald Reagan signed the Tax Reform Act of 1986, he slashed the highest tax rate down to 28 percent. Rich people then did what they do best, which was start businesses, create jobs, make profitable investments and create economic growth.

Now, with a top rate around 40 percent, the rich, in an attempt to avoid such steep rates, inject their money into tax shelters that are designed to create losses rather than profits. High taxes will stifle growth while dimming the prospects for the poor to take steps up the economic ladder.

What occurs with astonishing regularity is the commonly held belief by pompous politicians that not only is it OK to tax your money once, but even twice. Every person who seemed to lose sleep over Enron, etc., should view this potential ending of this particular double taxation with great zeal. (I predict partisan politicking getting in the way of this.)

As of late, corporations tried to reward shareholders through capital gains, instead of dividends—actually giving the investors a slice of the companies' profits. Once the economy started its downtown in 1998, companies that didn't pay dividends (most high tech don't) began losing capital, and the investors lost money. Consequently, companies would encourage investment by predicting future profits, incorporating artificial measures to boost stock prices, thus creating the unusual bookkeeping that saw the demise of so many huge corporations like Enron. Companies can't fake dividends; they cannot distribute profits if surpluses are actually the product of creative accounting.

If liberals were serious about seeking corporate reform and bringing about economic benefits to the poor, they'd embrace Bush's plans with enthusiasm rather than criticism. But they won't, because they're not.

Peace protest brings people together

By Phil Martoma
Senior Writer

This Saturday I had the fortunate opportunity to attend the Washington peace protest with other Bucknellians, and random assortments of people from our area. Much to the dismay of many (including my parents) I assembled with others to speak out against the current rhetoric regarding a war on Iraq.

Many are quick to criticize such vocalizations, or to label such protesters as latent hippies desiring to relive an earlier time. I write this apologia both to take credence from the latter opinion, and to remind us all that though many cannot understand the willingness of some to freeze outside Capitol Hill to make their opinions heard, we do have much in common with those that care little about international issues.

For one thing, I am not, nor have I ever been a hippie. I would take offense to such a classification not because I disagree with their political opinions but because of their taste in music. Hippies (stereotypically) like the Beatles. Though I like many things from Britain, such as Prince William, "Queer as Folk" and Hugh Grant, the Beatles do not rank very high on the list. I am far too materialistic to be a hippie. If I had to choose between making another petition and shopping for shoes, you had better believe that a cute pair of faux suede will rank higher on my list of priorities than any petition.

You might say to yourself, "Yet, Phil, I have never had the resolve to march in the freezing weather for a political cause, in lieu of sleeping in on Saturday!" Believe it or not, neither have I, and yet by some miraculous turn of events, I woke up. I was just as tired as any Bucknellian would be at 6 a.m. on a Saturday. So the more pertinent question is why did I not do what most Bucknellians chose to do last Saturday? I would like to attribute my actions to pure altruism, but that would be self-aggrandizing.

Instead, I would have to admit it had partly to do with the curiosity I had about the event as well as the opportunity to meet attractive young men, such as myself. Laugh if you will, but the dating scene for young gay males at Bucknell is rather dry.

This is not to say that my only motivation for going was tainted by the desire to flirt with men, but instead that my feelings against the war rank no more strongly than does the average American. Perhaps few Bucknellians feel dissatisfied with the recreational activities they find here because they are straight. I am simply saying that my personal preferences instead made me seek an outlet for expression against something for which many of us have a common cause. That cause, is the belief in peace, and effectiveness of diplomacy. Though we may all have differing opinions about Iraq, and what needs to be done in that country, most of us can agree that peace is preferable to war. I personally feel out of step with the seeming aggression between our two countries, and I don't think that I am alone in feeling this way.

Terror financing questioned

More so than drugs, oil funds terrorism

By Tim Hinkle
Writer

With all the attention that we have been giving to terrorism since Sept. 11, a great deal of discussion has come to how terrorists finance their evil campaigns. Terror finance networks exist all over the globe, pulling in funds from false businesses, charities and other illicit means. As the Bush administration has stated since the beginning, terrorists also get their funding from drug money. To hammer this into the public consciousness and to raise support for our nation's failed war on drugs, the White House-sponsored Office of National Drug Control Policy launched a massive advertising campaign designed to link casual drug users with terrorism.

These ads feature teens who buy marijana and other drugs, and how, in surprisingly few steps, their money gets into the hands of terrorists. These ads fail to mention that the vast majority of marijuana in the United States is grown within our borders or in Canada, and has no link whatsoever to the financing of terrorism.

This is clearly an attempt by the Bush administration to bolster their war on marijuana use in America, which includes arresting medical marijuana patients in California where they have twice, through voter initiatives, authorized the medical use of cannabis. These ads also fail to mention that the only reason drug dealing remains a profitable business is because of drug prohibition. Not only do the commercials fails to take an accurate look at the financing of terror, but they use millions of our tax dollars to deliberately deceive the public.

The Bush administration does not want you to know that the vast majority of terror funding comes from nations like Saudi Arabia and other allies in our war on terror. Where in turn, do they get that money? Through oil sales, of course. A group called Americans for Fuel Efficient Cars recently launched an advertising campaign called the Detroit Project in response to the federal government's misinformation campaign and to "point out the much more credible link between driving SUVs and our national security." Our driving habits have us addicted to foreign oil since our own meager supplies simply cannot supply the enormous amount that Americans consume. In order to fill this demand, we are forced to deal with countries that then turn the money over to their friends in Islamic terrorist groups.

Our need for oil has allowed our leaders to turn a blind eye to those who actually fund terror. The Bush administration, once again representing American oil interests has tried to shift the spotlight from SUV drivers to drug users, convenient scapegoats who nobody is rushing to defend. With the popularity of SUVs on the rise, we will only become further in need of foreign oil. But fear not, soon we will have Iraq's vast oil fields under our control, and then we'll be able to drive our SUVs from coast to coast without fear of moral responsibility. But if perpetual war isn't your thing, or you want to help support the war on terror, ditch your SUV and look to a more fuel efficient hybrid car, as the Detroit Project suggests. Let's tell Washington to raise fuel economy standards for SUVs and to put true national security ahead of the interests of the oil industry.

Millions unite to protest Iraq war

Protesters rally in Washington, D.C. to protest war in Iraq. These U.S. protesters were part of a global effort to discourage war in the Middle East.

By Michael Dudzinski
Staff Writer

In a last-ditch effort to persuade U.S. President George W. Bush and his administration, millions of people globally united last weekend to urge a peaceful resolution with Iraq.

CNN reported that protesters, holding signs saying "No War for Oil" and "War is not the Answer," were determined to address Bush's policies loud and clear. So bold was the protestors' message, that the United Nations hinted that war was no longer a viable solution in dealing with Iraq.

Anti-war sentiment is growing so much in Great Britain that British Parliament member Jeremy Corbyn traveled to Washington, D.C. to show his dissent for war.

"This is a war with no support, no public recognition for it and I think the leaders, particularly President Bush and Prime Minister [Tony] Blair, are going to have to recognize they're alone on this one," Corbyn said to CNN.

Corbyn was not the only politician to make a stand in Washington, D.C. last Saturday. CNN also documented that Rev. Jesse Jackson ardently addressed a crowd of participants, urging Americans to "choose minds over missiles and negotiation over confrontation."

"It does not stand reason to have an unfinished confrontation with al-Qaida, ignore the Middle East and fast-forward to Iraq," Jackson said.

Although the protests were led peacefully, the Associated Press reported a few aggravated occurrences.

A Sunday demonstration at the White House proved somewhat chaotic when a band of law enforcement officials were called in to break up a group of protesters attempting to block traffic. Likewise, two women were hospitalized after being trampled on that same afternoon.

Uncertainty prevails as to whether Bush will rescind his premise for war as a result of the peace rallies.

Even if the president does not budge, the protest was worthwhile Dunya Cope of Georgetown University said.

"It's historically important to show that there was such an outcry (against war), and that people didn't just go along with it," Cope said.

The Associated Press disclosed that Secretary of State Colin Powell subsequently assured Americans on CBS's "Face the Nation" that the president is "trying every means not to go to war." National Security Advisor Condoleezza Rice said that the demonstrations symbolized the strength of American liberties.

Opponents of war filled the streets from various places across the world on Saturday to mark the largest peace demonstration since the Vietnam War in 1969, CNN reported. Japanese civilians assembled in Tokyo, some sporting Bush costumes while protesting. Citizens in Moscow, Pakistan and Egypt also gathered in opposition of a U.S.-led war against Iraq.

The New York Times revealed that the peace rallies were coordinated during the Martin Luther King Jr. holiday as a way for demonstrators to signify the virtue of freedom. More significant was the goal for protesters to convey to the Arab world that all Americans have also become victims of Bush's foreign policy agenda and are not complacent with it.The New York Times said that public support for the war has steadily declined since last weekend, which various media polls have indicated.

Since Bush's case against Iraq has been made, and U.N. inspections commenced, no weapons of mass destruction have been discovered. The Bush administration has not provided any evidence to support its claim that Iraqi President Saddam Hussein does indeed possess such artillery. Although no date has yet been confirmed, the United Nations is set to make a decision within the upcoming days on whether military action would be justifiable against Iraq.

Bush challenges affirmative action

Supreme court to hear case against University of Michigan

By Lindsey Gentel
Staff Writer

U.S. President George W. Bush ordered the Justice Department on Jan. 15 to argue before the Supreme Court that the University of Michigan admissions program is unconstitutional because the policies offer racial points to black, Latino and American Indian applicants and set goals for minority admissions.

"I strongly support diversity of all kinds, including racial diversity in higher education," Bush said in a nationally televised address. "But in the method used by the University of Michigan to achieve this important goal is fundamentally flawed. At their core, the Michigan policies amount to a quota system that unfairly rewards or penalizes prospective students based solely on their race."

Bush has moved to the forefront of the nation's debate about affirmative action by agreeing with three white students who allege that they were denied admission to the undergraduate and law programs, while less qualified minority candidates were admitted.

According to The New York Times, the president said that while he supported programs that find a way to ensure more minority students enroll in universities, programs like the ones at Michigan "create another wrong and thus perpetuate our divisions."

Secretary of State Colin Powell has said that he disagrees with Bush's position on affirmative action before the Supreme Court. According to The Washington Post, Powell, one of two black members of Bush's cabinet, said he supports the methods the University of Michigan uses to augment minority enrollments in its undergraduate and law school programs.

"Whereas I have expressed my support for the polices used by the University of Michigan, the president, in looking at it, came to the conclusion that it was constitutionally flawed, based on the legal advice he received," Powell said on CBS's "Face the Nation."

National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice, another black member of Bush's administration, has also come forward, mildly opposing Bush's position on racial preferences in college admissions, according to MSNBC.com. Rice said that it is reasonable for a college or university to use race as one of many different measures in choosing which applicant to admit in order to attain the goal of a diverse student body.

"I believe that while race-neutral means are preferable, it is appropriate to use race as one factor among others in achieving a diverse student body," Rice said, according to MSNBC.com.

White House officials said Rice encouraged Bush to compromise that race could be used as a factor in admissions, though she agreed with his view that the Michigan program went too far, The Washington Post reported.

Bush has asserted that because the programs relied too heavily on race, they were unconstitutional. In Michigan's undergraduate school, minority candidates were given extra points in a formula to decide whether they could be admitted.

The law school simply counted race as one factor among many. Bush administration lawyers said that since the practice of this program resulted in each incoming class having a similar percentage of minority students, the program operated as a quota system.

The court is set to hear arguments in the case in April and is expected to issue a decision this spring.

Inspectors find empty warheads in Iraq

The presence of empty chemical warheads in Iraq violates a U.N. resolution

By Emily Post
Writer

U.N. weapons inspectors found 12 empty chemical warheads about 75 miles south of Baghdad on Jan. 16. The United States checked Iraq's weapons declaration and found no record of them.

U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell believes that with this discovery, the United States has the authority it needs to launch an attack on Iraq. By possessing these weapons, Iraqi President Saddam Hussein has blatantly violated the U.N. Security Council Resolution 1441, which calls for a "full, final and complete disclosure of weapons of mass destruction and a verified disarmament process in Iraq."

"It is Iraq's responsibility under 1441 to cooperate fully with the inspectors in the disarmament process," Powell said in The New York Times.

With this discovery comes the question of whether the existence of these weapons of mass destruction provides the American government with the necessary rationale to strike against Iraq.

U.S. President George W. Bush thinks so, but many close U.S. allies disagree. In response to the U.N.'s findings, Iraq said that their scientists would participate in private interviews with U.N. arms inspectors. Because Iraq is making efforts to cooperate with other inspection teams, countries such as France, a permanent member of the U.N. with power to veto any resolution that would authorize military action, see no reason to commence war.

The New York Times reported that "by making the commitments, Iraq seemed intent on convincing members of the United Nations, particularly those in Europe wary of a United States-led attack, that Iraq is willing to compromise and that inspections need more time and are a better option than war."

Meanwhile, American allies do not want the United States to act independently without their support.

Bush is not content with Iraq possessing any weapons.

According to The New York Times, the president said, "This business about more time—how much time do we need to see clearly that he [Hussein]'s not disarming?"

Bush said that Iraq's possession of these weapons is too large of a threat to the United States and American allies to wait for inspectors to determine what other undisclosed weapons Iraq has.

> "Let us ... be clear that time is running out for Saddam Hussein."
> —Jack Straw
> British foreign secretary

"The United States of America, in the name of peace, will insist that he disarm, and we will keep pressure," Bush said to The New York Times.

According to a Newsweek poll, 81 percent of Americans support U.S. military action if the United States attacks with its major allies and the support of the Security Council. On the other hand, only 39 percent of Americans support an attack if the United States is joined by only one or two major nations and without U.N. support. One close ally that remains in support of action against Iraq is Great Britain. British Prime Minister Tony Blair, like Bush, believes that we have the right to attack Iraq without the support of the United Nations.

"Let us ... be clear that time is running out for Saddam Hussein," said Jack Straw, the British foreign secretary.

President unveils plan to improve country's struggling economy

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

U.S. President George W. Bush is spending more time talking about the economy as it continues to be a vital issue in his administration. The saying "it's the economy, stupid" is one of the most well-known political clichés and one that can sink a president blindingly fast come election time. Recognizing this, the administration is showing a renewed interest in the economy and rolling out new tax policies and other economic stimuli to ensure that the 2004 election will not be about the economy.

The White House's new economic stimulus package is ambitious and promises to bring a large tax break to the American public. According to WhiteHouse.gov, there are three main issues the president hopes to address with the package. The ultimate goal is to bring back some strength and stability to the economy. Bush hopes to speed up the implementation of the 2001 tax cuts to bring their benefits faster. The package also extends unemployment benefits. Finally, the president wants to end double taxation of dividends.

President Bush speaks about the economy on a visit to St. Louis. Bush has been drawing both support and criticism for his economic stimulus package, which proposes to create more jobs and provide billions in tax relief.

According to the White House's Web site, "The president's jobs and growth package will provide $98 billion of total tax relief over the next 16 months and $670 billion over the next decade. It will spur real overall economic growth, yet it is disciplined and tailored to address specific challenges."

The plan is drawing fire from all sides as Democrats complain it will set the United States back by increasing the budget deficit to an unmanageable level. Others think that with the intended spending to cover the upcoming war in Iraq, the United States will not be able to afford the cuts. Others question the way dividend taxes really affect all Americans. They feel that this is only a tax benefit for the rich—the dividend tax only affects stockowners and many Americans do not directly own stock.

Many groups see this as a positive step for the economy. It will provide an opportunity for companies to reward investors and create more money that can be pumped into the economy. Investors are taking to the idea of the dividend tax disappearance warmly and so are companies.

Microsoft jumped on the dividend announcement with a declaration of its own, possibly a sign of things to come out of the technology industry. According to the company's Web site, it will pay its first-ever dividend to investors on Jan. 16 to return some of the billions in cash the company has amassed. The company also announced that it would split its stock two-for-one by the middle of February.

Microsoft CFO John Connors said in a statement, "Declaring a dividend demonstrates the board's confidence in the company's long-term growth opportunities and financial strength. We are especially pleased to be able to return profits to our shareholders, while maintaining our significant investment in research and development and satisfying our long-term capital requirements."

There are other pieces to the economy that the president will be watching over the coming months to make sure his leadership is taking the right course in helping the economy. If he fails to deal with these issues properly, they may come back and hurt him.

First, William McDonough, chairman of the Federal Reserve's New York branch, recently announced that he would retire as chairman in the next several weeks. According to the Associated Press, he "chaired the Fed's New York bank since July 1993. He was often touted as a successor to Greenspan, whose current term as chairman ends in June 2004. He played a key role in coordinating the government's response to the disruptions on Wall Street following the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and was instrumental in rescuing a giant U.S. investment fund, Long Term Capital Management, from collapse during the 1997-98 Asian currency crisis."

The Washington Post reported, "McDonough has been a staunch ally of Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan, voting to keep interest rates low during the 1990s as the economy boomed and stock prices soared. In a statement yesterday, Greenspan said McDonough's retirement 'will leave a pronounced void' at the central bank."

The U.S. dollar is also a cause for economic concern. It has been very weak lately and many economists and analysts expect that weakness to continue and perhaps get worse.

Dave Kansas, writing in The Wall Street Journal, said, "Ugly geopolitics, weak overseas economies and deep deficits all add up to a dull dollar for at least the next 12 months. What does that mean for the U.S. economy? Costlier imports and greater inflationary pressures are two problems to anticipate."

Kansas also said to The Wall Street Journal that there are positive possibilities with a weak dollar.

"On the flip side, a weaker dollar helps make U.S. companies be more competitive overseas, especially in the technology and services sectors," Kansas said. "Mark Chandler, head of foreign exchange strategy at HSBC estimates that 40 percent to 50 percent of S&P 500 earnings come from overseas, thus a weaker dollar should give a lift to corporate profits this year."

The U.S. trade deficit is also showing dangerous signs. In a perfect world, the United States would import as much as it exports, but the trend has seen the United States import much more than it exports. There are many reasons for this, but the record set in November has many wondering about the overall strength of the economy.

The New York Times reported, "The trade deficit widened to a record $40.1 billion in November as imports surged after a resumption of business at West Coast ports, according to a Commerce Department report. The wider trade gap in goods and services came after a revised $35.2 billion shortfall in October and reflected a record inflow of holiday and other consumer merchandise, the Commerce Department said. Imports had declined in October, when ports in California, Oregon and Washington closed early in the month after shippers locked out union dockworkers in a labor dispute."

All these factors leave many questions unanswered about the state of the U.S. economy. Many businesses are betting that there will be more good news than bad in the next 12 months. They should rest assured that their president is also looking for the same thing. Bush is hoping his handling of the economy turns positive fast or he may have more work to do in 2004.

Women's team posts its first Patriot League victory

With a 74-65 win the Lady Bison defeat Navy for the tenth straight time and improved their overall record to 6-9

By Joe Schweitzer
Staff Writer

The Bucknell Women's basketball team posted its first Patriot League victory 74-65 over Navy on Jan. 18. The game marked the Lady Bison's 10th straight win over the Mids and improved their overall record to 6-9, 1-2 in the Patriot League.

The game was filled with impressive scoring runs by both squads and reflected the roller coaster ride that the Orange and Blue have had this season. Navy sprinted to an early lead at 20-12 behind 10 points from Navy standout Courtney Davidson. Kate Franks '03 hit two key three pointers as the Bison responded with a 14-2 run over the next six minutes to pull ahead 26-22.

After several lead changes, Bucknell ended the half with a 9-2 run including six points from Desire Almind '04 for a 37-28 lead.

The second half continued the same trend as the Bison opened a 13 point lead, 41-28, only to be held scoreless for nearly five minutes as the Mids came storming back to knot the game at 43-43 midway through the second half.

Bucknell tightened its defense to stay close and then used clutch rebounding and free throw shooting, including a 9-10 effort in the final 2 minutes, 14 seconds of the game to tally its first Patriot League victory.

"This was a great victory for our team today," Head Coach Kathy Fedorjaka said. "We knew Navy was going to give us everything we could handle and our kids did a great job of fighting through it."

The Orange and Blue's three-headed monster of Molly Creamer '03, Franks, and Almind led the way by combining for 66 of the team's 74 points. Creamer and Franks both scorched the nets for 23 points, including Franks' impressive 5-7 showing from three point land. Almind fought hard inside, recording 20 points and 10 rebounds for her fourth double-double of the season.

"I feel an obvious similarity between this team and last year's team is having Molly and Des out on the court with me," co-captain Kate Franks said. "Having played with those two the past two years, we kind of know each other's games pretty well, which makes it easier out on the court."

On Jan. 15, the Orange and Blue Ladies opened Sojka Pavilion in heartbreaking fashion with a 74-67 loss to Lehigh. The defeat kept the Bison from celebrating their first Patriot League victory and dropped their league record to 0-2, 5-9 overall.

The game was built up to be one of the better clashes of the season as all-leaguers Creamer and Lehigh's Ann Tierney were squaring off in an early battle to become Patriot League Player of the Year. The interesting storyline was whether Lehigh's young backcourt could contain Creamer's outstanding playmaking ability and if Bucknell's young frontcourt could stop Tierney's low post assault.

"The low post is a constant battle of strength, with the biggest difference from high school to college being the physical play under the basket," low post standout Chelsea Smith '06 said. "It takes hard work to post up and

Men's Basketball drops third straight

The Bison men's basketball team dropped its third consecutive game on Jan. 21, losing at Cornell (6-8, 1-0), 64-60. Despite the fact that only three Big Red players converted on field goals, Bucknell (7-9, 1-2) was unable to overcome a 15-2 Cornell run early in the second half of play.

Although Boakai Lalugba '03, the Patriot League's leading scorer and rebounder, was held at bay by the Big Red with just two field goals, Kevin Bettencourt '06 picked up the offense with 17 points. Bettencourt does not feel the pressure of being relied on as the sole alternative offensive threat.

"I did not necessarily feel like I needed to step up the offense, knowing Boakai has a tough time getting shots," Bettencourt said. "I think that I am getting more available and getting open shots due to all the attention teams have been giving him lately, though."

The first-year student connected on his first four attempts of the game, three of which came from beyond the arc. Lalugba concluded the contest with 10 points and eight rebounds.

A victory appeared within reach for the Orange and Blue at the conclusion of the first half, as Chris Niesz's '05 two three-point field goals propelled the team to a 33-28 halftime advantage. After a Davorin Skornik '04 inside bucket opened the second half, Cornell began its ferocious run. The final lead change occurred with 17:31 remaining in the game when Cornell canned a three-point shot to take a 37-35 lead.

A Bettencourt shot from downtown cut the lead to, 54-52 late in the game, but the Bison allowed too many second chance opportunities to be in position to win the battle and Cornell converted well on its free throws. Although Bucknell had a chance to tie the game with 23 seconds left, Daniel Blankenship '03 was called for an offensive foul and

Swimming triumphs

By Stephen Schwanhausser

This week the Bucknell women's swimming and diving teams are celebrating the completion of their winter training trips and a decisive victory over Colgate University this past weekend. Over winter break, the swimmers spent a 10-day stint in Naples, Fla. to train for the final months of their season. For the first time ever, the divers trained at a separate facility in Orlando. For both teams this annual trip has proven to be an essential component of their preparation and was once again highly successful. For the swimmers, the trip started out with what Head Coach Jerry Foley called a "thunderbolt," as unfortunate circumstances caused them to miss their flight to Florida, and, consequently the team spent nearly 30 hours on a bus. After arriving at their destination, the training event passed flawlessly and provided a strong base off which to compete second semester.

"Although we were faced with adversity in our travels, our accommodations in both the hotel, pool, and weight training facilities proved better than any I've seen in past years. Everyone worked diligently and I believe overall the trip was a huge success," Senior Captain Darby Golino said.

The diving team trained away from the swimmers in an indoor facility. This worked well due to expanded board space and training.

Their work in Florida paid off in competition against Colgate University, resulting in a strong win190-110 win over the Raiders for the Bison. The competition began with a 1st place finish in the 200 medley relay when the combination of Golino, Jamie Flick '05, Mary Krakowski '06, and Meghan Freese '04 finished over a second ahead of Colgate in a time of 1 minute, 50.59 seconds. Following this opening event, the Bison women swept the 1,000-yard freestyle event with Daniela Faas '04, Krisztina Poda '04 and Andrea Kern '04 achieving 1st through 3rd, respectively. As the meet continued into the 200-yard freestyle, Jen Cancro '04 and Lectie Altman '06 placed 1st and 2nd, with Cancro finishing in 1:58.58. The sprint freestyle events were dominated by Freese, as she won both the 50-yard (24.40) and the 100-yard (53.31). In the final free event of the day, the 500-yard, the Bison once again showed their depth, earning the top four finishes led by Faas, Cancro, Jackie Feinthel '05 and Leslie Rice '05.

Even with Jon Cruden's integral knowledge of the Raiders, the trio of Charlie Garner, Jerry Rice and MVP Rich Gannon will be too much for Tampa Bay to overcome. Unfortunately for Tampa Bay, even if they do "give him the damn ball," Keyshawn Johnson and the rest of the Bucs will be no match for the Raiders offense. Martin Grammatica will have an excellent game, making two 50-plus-yard field goals, but unfortunately after the second field goal he will injure himself for next season jumping up and down ... oh, wait ... he already did that. Stay tuned after the game for some spectacular riots in the streets of Oakland. Burning cars, huge bonfires, drinking heavily and huge brawls among fans; isn't this what football is all about?

No one really knows who Ronde Barber is, and perhaps it's better that way. He's good, but to know Ronde is to know Tiki from the Giants and that is certainly a road best left unpaved. Regardless, Ronde and the inescapable Warren Sapp, inescapable because the universal force of attraction between all objects that tends to pull them toward one another, the force known as gravity which emanates from deep within Sapp's cavernous stomach, will be worthy of some attention. And if you thought THAT was an overused metaphor, keep a tally of the number of times Gannon is referred to as a "cannon." I'll pick the underdog Buccaneers by three.

There was a time in my youth when I was reluctant to enter the video rental place because I was so terrified of the Chuckie doll on the store's "Child's Play" poster. Seriously, it took me years to get over my paralyzing fear of that creepy toy scuttling into my room and disposing of me with some sort of pointy office supply. Because of the deeply-entrenched scars left from that struggle, I feel compelled to pick the Bucs to win—if for no other reason, simply to reduce my irrational fear that if I don't, Jon Gruden will creep through my window and kill me with scissors. No seriously, I think this team's defense is monstrous, and I think they won't allow Oakland's offense to operate on the loose rein it has in the past.

Bucs 17, Raiders 14.

The best coach that the NFL may ever see, Jon Gruden, will not lose in the Super Bowl to his ex-team, Tampa Bay's secondary proved in the NFC Championship that they will up for the task of handling Jerry Rice and Tim Brown. Bush will consider moving troops to combat unruly (and strange) Raiders fans after the loss.

Bucs 24, Raiders 17

With the biggest game of the year coming up this weekend, The Bucknellian decided to conduct a poll about who Bucknellians thought was going to win the Super Bowl. These are some of the results:

"I say Raiders by 10. Rarely does a trash-talking bunch rise to Super Bowl stardom. Arrogance is usually snuffed out, not rewarded. Warren Sapp and the Bucs will talk up a storm, but I think the Raiders will dominate and sink their ship. In this ironic matchup between two teams of pirates, look to see the Bucs thrown overboard on Sunday."

Martin Wade '06

"Well at least it'll be a good matchup now that yet another Philadelphia sports team has choked. That game just wouldn't have been even close. Give the Eagles credit, they do have an annoying chant and they did lose to a superior team. B-U-C-S, Bucs, Bucs, Bucs win it all."

Tom Brophy '04

"Being a lifelong Chargers fan, I can't help but hate the Raiders even though I like their players. Anyway, I'll pick the Bucs 27-24 in a controversial overtime that will forever change the way fans view the archaic pro football tie-breaking system."

Bob Gaines Public Relations and Publications, AD

"As much as I hate to say it, being raised a 49ers fan and taught to despise the Raiders, but the Raiders will win because they have an ex-Niner, Jerry Rice. Also they will have the crowd on their side. At the Chargers' home game versus the Raiders, there were 10 times more Raiders fans than Chargers fans. Most importantly though, the Raiders will win because my man Gil Villanueva in Admissions says they will win, and his 3-year-old Grant says it, too.

Brad Ward Admissions AD

"Personally, I am still mad at what happened to the Eagles on Sunday, but come to think of it we are a city of losers anyway. (Well, since 1983.) So I say that if I were to choose between the Bucs (who beat us just recently) and the Oakland Raiders (who beat us in our only Super Bowl appearance in 1981, I would choose ... the seasick crocodile! Nah, just joking. I guess I will root for Oakland if only to get revenge for what Tampa did to Philly."

Louis Blau, '03

"Oakland's powerful offense will finally be slowed down by an absolutely dominant Tampa Bay defense. Combine that with the fact that Tampa Bay's offense is peaking at the right time, and this game has all the makings for an upset. Tampa Bay will win this one 23-21 on a last-second field goal by Martin Gramatica, who will then hurt himself celebrating the game-winning kick."

Mark Walker '06

"I predict the Bucs will win. I liken the Bucs to the Ravens of two years ago. The Bucs flaunt a stellar defense and a competent, efficient offense. The Rams offense last year was better than this Raider one, and the Patriots managed to stop it. The Bucs also gain an intangible advantage in having Gruden as their coach. His knowledge of the Raiders should produce an effective game plan."

Matt Del Guidice '03

"The Raiders will win the Super Bowl. They just keep proving over and over again that they have too many weapons on offense—the league's best quarterback, three Pro-Bowl-caliber receivers and the league's most underrated running back in Charlie Garner. Their run defense is stellar and they also have one of the league's better secondaries. Tampa Bay won't be able to stop them on defense and they won't be able to put enough points up on offense."

Otto Tancraitor '05

"Who cares?! The Philadelphia Eagles' loss at home was so devastating that I don't even want to read about football, let alone watch a Super Bowl that they were destined to be a part of."

Bob Tripple '05

"Brad Johnson is a better quarterback than Rich Gannon any day of the week. Tampa also has an advantage in that they actually still have Gruden/Chuckie, not to mention the locomotive known as Mike Alstott. Go Bucs."

Charles Mitchell '05

"Although on paper the Bucs defense is statistically the best in the NFL, it needs to be noted that they only faced four opponents this season ranked in the top 10 in total offense. Gannon's pinpoint accuracy and oversized offensive line will be too much for Derrick Brook's and Warren Sapp's stingy defense. I'm taking the Raiders 28-20."

Charles Wattles '06

"Raiders 27 to Bucs 13. The Bucs pass rush will be handled by the Raiders with an array of short screens and slants. Tampa cannot match up with Oakland's receivers either in the Cover 2 or the Nickel set. Oakland's pass rush will get to Brad Johnson, and coupled with a dormant running game, Tampa never gets going and makes Gruden's homecoming not as he had visioned."

Jeffrey Wodlinger '05

"Oakland is a more solid team with the leadership of the MVP Rich Gannon. The fact that Jon Gruden will now be the opposing coach will add an interesting element, but Oakland shouldn't have any trouble winning this game."

Lauren Lombardo '05

Bucc-kling under the pressure

Sportswriters have an intrinsic infatuation with redemption. It is, after all, a theme that routinely garners universal appeal. We're just mesmerized by late round draft picks, ex-CFLers, ex-arena-leaguers, ex-XFLers, ex-marching band members, ex-grocers and pretty much anyone who's ever been cut by any team, ever. The rule of thumb follows that the appeal level rises dramatically in congruence with the previous levels of patheticism.

Sportswriter logic hypothesizes, based on this theory, that the more engaging tales of adversity we can drag up from the mires of someone's past, the more we can increase that subject's perceived level of "pluckiness." More pluckiness, of course, equals more appeal.

Following along these trusty guidelines, it only makes sense to approach Super Bowl XXXVII by immediately scrounging through the histories of all members involved, digging up a few sad stories of past failures and disappointments and then preaching on and on about what a grand stage for redemption this game will be.

But in truth, the challenge in finding a redemption candidate really evaporated from the whole process as soon as the NFC Championship game was committed into the books. The Tampa Bay Buccaneers are going to the Super Bowl. That, in and of itself, is the Holy Grail of once-implausible occurrences.

Expansion franchises, across all sports, are traditionally disastrous in their first season or two. "Disastrous" is far too mild a descriptor for the Buccaneers' early efforts. The team shed their training wheels and launched an ill-starred maiden voyage in the fall of 1976, and would proceed to spend the next four months adding previously unthinkable dimensions to the term "growing pains."

Statistics speak volumes about that 1976 season, perhaps none more than the distribution of numbers across the win-loss columns. Wins: 0. Losses: 14. It marked the first, and only, time since 1944 that an NFL team stumbled to defeat in every single one of its games across an entire season.

If that wasn't convincing enough, the not-so-menacing marauders continued with what seemed like an inviolable tradition of inadequacy well into the 1977 season, running up their losing streak to an impressive 26 games before finally winning one. It's like they say—the 27th time is the charm.

Win-loss records, of course, don't always tell the whole story. Sometimes it isn't as bad as it looks. Sometimes—and it's the case that the Bucs' 1976 season was one of those times—it's actually even worse than it looks. The Buccaneers were outscored 412-125, an average of 20 points each game.

To put the Bucs' 125 points in perspective, consider that the 2002 Cincinnati Bengals—this year's banner team for total ineptitude—managed to toss 279 points onto the board in their favor. Mathematically speaking, that makes the 1976 Buccaneers more than twice as pathetic as this year's bungling Bengals.

It's no wonder that Bucs' hardy and brutally honest Head Coach John McKay's response to a question regarding the execution of his team's offense was, "I'm all for it."

Starting quarterback Steve Spurrier piloted the offense through 12 of the 14 games, five of which resulted in a goose-egg on the scoreboard. The team lost its first game 20-0. The second game resulted in a 23-0 effort of futility that saw the Bucs gain a total of four passing yards. As the season rolled on, the embarrassment turned to humiliation, the humiliation to disgrace, and finally, when the team ran out of descending rungs on the ladder of competency, the whole thing just became laughable. They lost 34-0 to the Jets, 42-zip to a merciful Pittsburgh team, 48-13 to Denver and 49-16 to Oakland.

By the time the end of the season came and put them out of their misery, at least temporarily, all McKay had to say about his crew was that they'd be back.

"Maybe not this century," he said. "But we'll be back and we will be a better football team."

So here we are, three years into the next century, and old John McKay's words of wit are beginning to seem more like words of wisdom.

The Bucs' regurgitated-Meow-Mix-colored jerseys have been revamped in favor of a decidedly more intimidating cut-throat, blood-red and tarnished gold design. "Buccaneer Bruce," the disturbingly dapper swashbuckler that used to grace the team's helmets has given way to a more gruesome skull-and-swords flag. The humorous, biting quips of McKay have been replaced by the killer-doll facial contortions of Jon Gruden.

And, of course, the "bad news Bucs" are no longer their own worst enemies, as they were in 1976 (and several other seasons over the next pair of decades). Instead, having put together the best defense in the league, they may be the worst nightmare of every opposing offense in the league.

They'll have to thwart a gallant offense and a gritty defense in the Oakland Raiders, a team with a few of its own redemption-seeking subplots. Even this far-removed from their harrowing past, the Buccaneers have by no means seen the last of adversity.

Still, this league seems to spew out Cinderella stories as though there's some secret, ancient script signed by Pete Rozelle that necessitates a certain frequency of cloying, sappy, zero-to-hero ascensions to fame per each half-decade. With that in light, the Buccaneers chances, based on the past-patheticism factor, are pretty damn good.

Goliath vs. Goliath

"Quarterbacks eating dirt and cheerleaders in short skirts ..."

Ahh, what more can you ask for? Fueled by inspirational commercials and hard-hitting play, Super Bowl XXXVII euphoria has arrived—this year featuring the league's MVP (Rich Gannon) and defensive player of the year (Derrick Brooks). If that doesn't wet your appetite, we'll be treated to NFL's best offense (Oakland Raiders), against Tampa Bay Buccaneers' No. 1 ranked defense.

The Raiders strength is passing the football. Staring them in the face is the best pass defensive unit in 20 years—the Bucs. While most teams cringe in the face of meeting the Bucs, Gannon has other ideas.

"We change tempo a little bit and try to get looks so we can get plays dialed up," Gannon said. "We are a team that can be more balanced. We ran the ball well in the last month of the season. We didn't do it [last] Sunday, but we will do a better job running the ball next week."

While most sports analysts focus on the No. 1 ranked units for each respective team, I see the game being determined by "the other guys." Will the Raiders defense pick quarterback Brad Johnson's pocket, or will running back Mike Alstott run wild on the Raider defense? Super Bowls usually come down to clock management and special team play. Look for the team that breaks the big run back or creates a turnover late in the game to be holding the Vince Lombardi trophy high.

MVP Rich Gannon hopes to unleash the best of his Raiders' high-powered offense against Tampa Bay's daunting defense, which has held opposing passers to a 48.4 rating this year.

The main off-the-field story coming from San Diego, the host city for the Super Bowl, is the meeting of Tampa Coach Jon Gruden with his ex-team, Oakland Raiders. Gruden, "traded" to the Bucs this season in exchange for two first round selections, two 2nd round picks and eight million dollars, will get his chance to prove he was worth the steep price. (The Raiders were able to land three rookie starters in wide receiver Jerry Porter, tight end Doug Jolley, and defensive back Phillip Buchanan with those picks.) On the surface, I wondered how any coach can be worth so much, but in just his first season in the helm, Gruden has positioned defensive tackle Warren Sapp and company to upset the football gods and pull out the improbable victory. This trade is similar to the Dallas Cowboys trading Herschel Walker to the Vikings for multiple first round picks, including Emmitt Smith, which helped make the 'Boys the dominate team of the 90s.

When the smoke clears Sunday, I see the Bucs pulling off the upset in San Diego.

Last Friday brought together a David and Goliath match-up between Shaquille O'Neal and Yao Ming. In what was their first meeting, fans were treated to matchups reminiscent of the "big men" battles of Patrick Ewing and Hakeem Olujuwon.

O'Neal is a 7-1, 360-pound athlete whose combination of brute strength and low-post talent has led the Lakers to multiple titles. Yao is one of the best athletes from the world's most populated nation, a transcendent figure who is only beginning to show why he became the first foreigner selected first in the NBA draft.

The Decker Effect—big build-up, little results—was no where to be found! Yao proved from the start that he would not be bullied around by O'Neal, blocking O'Neal's first three shots. After four hotly contested quarters of action O'Neal finished with the better statistical line—31 points, 13 rebounds and four assists to Yao's 10 points, 10 rebounds and six blocks—but where it hurts most, the Houston Rockets defeated the Los Angeles Lakers 108-104.

"He's a classy guy," O'Neal said of Yao. "I was looking forward to playing him. He's a great player. It's another challenge for me."

In a sign of sportsmanship, Yao and O'Neal exchanged handshakes and a brief hug as they walked off the court.

Alright, let's take a trip to kangaroo country and chat about the sizzling tennis action at the Australian open! On the ladies side the Williams sisters are continuing their inevitable crash course, with Venus Williams collecting a 6-4, 6-3 victory over 7th-ranked Daniela Hantuchova. She launched an Open record 125 mph ace, having the ball boys take just one more step away from the court...

The other Williams, Serena, had a wake-up call early in the tournament-- being taken to three sets by little-known French player Emilie Loit in the first round—but has dropped just 11 games in her subsequent three matches.

"Every match that goes on, I'm going to have a much tougher match. So I'm just here, taking it one point at a time, one match at a time. However the outcome is, I'll take it—as long as it's positive," Serena said.

The romantic news from the Open comes from Steffi Graf, who might make a comeback to tennis at Roland Garros to honor a promise to husband Andre Agassi if he wins a fourth Australian Open. Agassi said Tuesday that if he can win the men's title at the Australian Open on Sunday, the former world No. 1 Graf would have to partner with him in mixed doubles at the French Open.

On the men's side, Andre Agassi looks poised to get his wife out on the tennis court after executing precision serves Tuesday in overwhelming Sebastien Grosjean 6-3, 6-2, 6-2 to breeze into the semifinals of the Australian Open.

Agassi hasn't lost a match in Australia since 1999 and has dropped just one set—against Nicolas Escude in the third round—in this tournament.

Across the bracket, pretty boy Lleyton Hewitt lost 6-7 (4), 7-6 (4), 7-6 (5), 6-4 to Frenchman Younes El Aynaoui on Monday. El Aynaoui had to play great tennis to beat the world's No. 1, finishing with 33 aces.

A Bettor's Debt

Bud Selig is trying desperately to leave some sort of mark on baseball other than the notch on his club like a warrior tallying his victims. Over the past few months, word from the tortoise has it that Pete Rose may be headed for the Hall of Fame, pending his approval of Selig's proposal of an admission, an apology and a short probation.

So Pete Rose was an inveterate gambler. Sue him! Who among us has never had the urge to gamble? Can he really be blamed for acting on an impulse that we all have? Doesn't he just represent the mafia crime boss in all of us?

If we want to blame Rose for anything, shouldn't it be for being hopelessly stupid about his iniquities? The insurmountable evidence brought against him is staggering. How can one man bet so much with so little regard for cleaning his tracks? Contrary to Rose's seeming ideology, burning bridges is not the same as wiping off fingerprints.

The sheer volume of betting slips, phone records, squealing bookies and banking notes brought to bear against Rose like the People vs. Kris Kringle is enough to make Enron executives cringe. I haven't seen poor record keeping this bad since the Minnesota Timberwolves renegotiated Joe Smith's contract.

For the uninitiated, Pete Rose holds the mark for most career hits. It is true that he was forced to retire as a player because his stats dwindled far too greatly. It is also true that, as a manager, he wrote himself into the lineup to collect more hits at the expense of better players on the team.

Rose critics argue that his stats are based entirely on longevity rather than superiority. Though few contend that Rose was as great a hitter as Ted Williams, his dominance and his numbers don't lie. Even if his stats are based on longevity, the physical fortitude that is required to be in the league for a record 24 years is astonishing in and of itself. Cal Ripken is a well-respected player, but without question, he stayed on for a few too many years. But we respect him for being an "iron-man."

If Rose bet on baseball, he has devalued the sport, this much is true. But this is no different from drug users, rapists and murders, yet we've seen greats like Lawrence Taylor and Ray Lewis hold top honors in football and Ken Caminiti and Jose Canseco in baseball.

I don't buy the "crime against baseball" vs. "crime against society" argument. If drugs are helping players boost their stats, they're destroying the integrity of all the ballers who played before them. Thirty home runs means absolutely nothing these days and it's NOT just because of higher altitude, juiced balls or shorter fences. These players are taking performance enhancers. Just because one disrupts the integrity of the managerial position versus the integrity of the players themselves doesn't change the fact that they are both social miscreants.

That being said, I don't necessarily agree that these players should be prohibited from the upper echelons of their sports, or at least not on the completely arbitrary basis that currently exists. I hate holding people to a higher standard simply because of the media focus. If I won the lottery tomorrow, I'd hate to see the scrutiny with which my life is subjected, and all because I made a decision to step into the 7-Eleven and buy a couple tickets.

So what's the solution? Where do we find solace in these troubling times when we're forced to choose between our culture's Judeo-Christian morality and our own idiosyncratic humanity? I for one am turning to Blues Clues whose own pop icon brand of edu-humor is particularly relevant in our post-Crazy Beautiful-Pearl Harbor-Gangs of New York stupor that grips the nation by the gonads with the adamancy of an American Idol reject. Blues Clues alone can turn this sinking ship of state around, and I'm not just talking baseball.

BC knows the score. BC is all about doing what's right. He's suave, debonair, keeps his cool under the hot media lights, and he always has the answer. If BC had been the spokestoon of baseball 13 years ago, I guarantee Pete would be in the Hall right now and the wounds of the past would have been allowed to mend. Yet here we are, bogged in this quagmire of resentment and pain and all because of a few thousand dollars a day ($15,000 approximately) worth of illegal gambling. It's a shame we should suffer so much over something so small.

I respect Rose for his accomplishments, but let's be fair. You can't hold one man out to dry for his sins while others commit similar atrocities daily and still win MVPs, Cy Youngs and World Series rings. Let's even the standards.

Ultimately, why do we hate Pete Rose? Is it that he broke the law? Is it the 13 years of lies? Is it that he bastardized America's pastime? Is it because he made us realize that behind every Dr. Jekyll is a Mr. Hyde? No, I think it's because we want to feel superior to the greats. I think it makes us comfortable, if not ecstatic to say, "He may have gotten more career hits than me, but I never gambled or got banned from baseball."

Though my remarks earlier were probably construed as somewhat satirical, I do believe that there is a little bit of Pete Rose in all of us. We are all successful, phenomenal people, but as soon as they find that elusive eyewitness testimony, it's all downhill from there.

Don't blame the Refs.... It's not all their fault

By Mark Walker
Staff Writer

During this year's NFL playoffs, controversy has unfortunately overshadowed a series of great plays, great comebacks and great finishes. The controversy kicked off wild card weekend during the Giants-49ers game. Trailing by one with six seconds left, the Giants sent out their field goal unit to try a game-winning 41-yard field goal. Veteran long snapper Trey Junkin released his second poor snap of the game, which forced holder Matt Bryant to frantically scramble and to throw a prayer downfield. His pass was intended for Rich Seubert, who was an eligible receiver. Chike Okeafor interfered with Seubert as he tried to make the catch. The referees did not call pass interference because they thought that Seubert was an ineligible man downfield. The Giants did have an ineligible man downfield on the play, but it was guard Tam Hopkins, not Seubert. Therefore, an ineligible man penalty should have been called on Hopkins, and a pass interference call should have been made on Okeafor. As a result, the penalties should have been offsetting, giving the Giants another play.

As a Giants fan, I can say that it was unfortunate that the call was blown, but in no way should the Giants or their fans blame the officials for the loss. The Giants lost the game because of bad decision making, poor execution, stupid penalties and horrible clock management. The Giants should never have put themselves in a situation where a bad call could cost them the game.

It was unfortunate that the call was blown, but in no way should the Giants or their fans blame the officials for the loss.

It certainly was not the officials' fault that the Giants blew a 24-point third quarter lead. They got a little too content with the lead and foolishly went into the prevent defense, which never works! The Giants secondary gave Terrell Owens and the rest of the 49er receivers way too much of a cushion, and the 49ers took advantage, moving the ball downfield at will.

It was also not the officials' fault that Shaun Williams of the Giants made two of the stupidest penalties that I have ever seen. The 49ers were set to go for a two-point conversion to build a three point lead. Before the two-point try, the 49ers got a personal foul penalty, which would have forced them to try for a nearly impossible 17-yard two-point conversion. However, Williams retaliated and got a personal foul, which allowed the 49ers to go back to the 2-yard line.

The two-point try still failed, but Williams did not learn his lesson. Following the play, Owens got a personal foul for unnecessary roughness. Williams foolishly ran over and hit Owens back, creating offsetting personal fouls. Had Williams kept his cool, the 49ers would have had to kick off 15 yards further back. The Giants returned the kick to their own 48-yard line, so they could have conceivably been on the 49er 37-yard line had it not been for Williams' foolish penalty. Without the penalty, the Giants could have been in a position to score a touchdown rather than having to risk a field goal with their shaky kicking unit.

Many different miscues can be blamed for the Giants' loss, but the officiating should not take the blame. Any time a game comes down to the wire, there is a risk of a bad call impacting the outcome of a game. Officials are human, so mistakes must be expected. One missed call by an official does not have as big an impact as many mistakes by a team.

I have always been amazed by how strong the officiating is in the NFL. The pace of the game is so fast and so much happens on every play that it is inevitable that a few calls will be missed in the course of a game. However, in the course of a season, these bad calls will even themselves out. Still, on a whole, the NFL's referees do a superb job with knowing the rules and making the right calls.

Men's swimming tops Colgate

By Lauren O'Connor
Staff Writer

The Bucknell men's swim team topped the Colgate Raiders 173-127 on Sat., Jan. 18 in the Lineberry Natatorium, bringing its record to 3-2.

"The team looked strong against Colgate. Our training trip always allows us to swim much faster second semester than first, and we certainly capitalized on this strength" said Stephen Schwanhausser, a senior on the team.

The Bison started the meet by winning the first four events, and by the end of the day the team collected a total of eight first place finishes. The 200 medley relay team, made up of Mark Kretzer '06, Stelios Saffos '03, Peter Garvin '04, and Michael Willats '04, finished the race in 1:37.56. Kurt McCoy '03 won the 1000 freestyle in a 9:59.59. Bucknell struck gold again in the next two events, the 200 freestyle and the 100 backstroke, with good performances by Todd Bauer '06 (1:46.96) and Christopher Feinthel '03(:55.28).

Saffos, Schwanhausser, and Will Schilling '06 led the Bison to a 2, 3, 4 finish in the 100 breaststroke. Bucknell swept the next event, the 200 fly; Kretzer led the team in a 1:57.65. He was followed by teammates Ryan Fisher and Gonzolo Diaz '03. In both of the sprint events, the 50 freestyle and 100 freestyle, Garvin placed second.

Kretzer won his third race of the day in the 200 backstroke in a 1:59.44. In the next two swims, the Bison went with Schwanhausser (2:10.69) and Schilling (2:11.42) in the 200 breaststroke and Bauer (4:50.32) and McCoy (4:52.33) in the 500 freestyle. Garvin captured the bronze in the 100 butterfly in :54.43. Matt Hallowell '04 had a second place finish in the 200 individual medley. Another silver medal was earned by the 400 freestyle relay team of Brooks Steadman '06, Bauer, Jake Thieman '05, and Willats in a 3:19.19.

"We were at full strength for the first time this semester and were able to dominate the meet beginning to end," first-year swimmer Todd Bauer said.

After winning against Lafayette on Jan. 11, 162-136, and Colgate, the men's swim team now looks ahead to Lehigh on Feb. 1.

"I'm really looking forward to the end of the season. We have a large senior class who I believe will contribute much as a unit, and the combination of a talented freshman class and strong sophomores and juniors will really help us this year," Schwannhausser said. "Looking towards my last dual meet as a Bison, I am filled with excitement; we use our performance against Lehigh as an annual gauge of our preparedness. I think we are ready and these next few weeks should hold much excitement in our new pool."

THERE'S NOT ENOUGH ART IN OUR SCHOOLS.

NO WONDER PEOPLE SAY

"GESUNDHEIT" WHEN YOU SAY

"TCHAIKOVSKY."

If one were to make a quick list of the world's favorite composers, despite his relatively recent vintage (he's only been dead for a century) Peter Ilyich Tchaikovsky would certainly make the list. After all, he composed Swan Lake, which is perhaps the most famous ballet of all time. And there certainly can't be more than a handful of ballet companies that don't stage a production of The Nutcracker every Christmas.

Fig. 1 Pollen

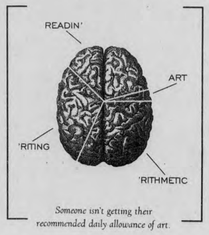
And why not? Indeed, this great Romantic composer should be so immortalized. As a young man, he quit a secure government job — at enormous risk and against his father's advice — in order to pursue a career in music. His mild temperament combined with his tendency to work too hard left him with terrible insomnia, debilitating headaches and hallucinations. On top of that, Tchaikovsky's composition teacher never liked his work, even after he became world-famous.

Setbacks such as these could have finished a lesser man. Instead, they informed his work, which remains some of the best loved in history. Yet some children still confuse Tchaikovsky with a nasal spasm.

Among the many setbacks Peter Ilyich Tchaikovsky endured: a disapproving family, a loveless marriage, a blind barber.

BLESS YOU, MR. T.

No sensible parent would ever say that arts education isn't important to their child's well-being. Quite the opposite, in fact; when asked, a majority of parents believe the arts are an integral part. They know painting and dance and music and drama help foster analytical thinking, improve overall academic performance, promote a healthy sense of individuality and bolster self-confidence. Not to mention, of course, the obvious creative outlet they provide young minds.



Someone isn't getting their recommended daily allowance of art.

Given all of this, what responsible parent would ever think it's a good idea that their kids spend more time waiting in line in the cafeteria each week than they do in arts classes?

IS THIS SWAN LAKE'S SWAN SONG?

If you think the declining standards in schools today are just the price of doing business, then do nothing. If, on the other hand, you feel this is unacceptable and disadvantageous to your child's welfare, you need to speak up and demand his or her fair share of the arts. To find out how or for more information about all the benefits of arts education, please visit us on the web at AmericansForTheArts.org. Or else the life's work of Peter Ilyich Tchaikovsky may end up seeming like just another casualty of allergy season.

receive the ball in good position, and even more work to keep your opponent from doing this."

Bucknell took advantage of the new arena's energy early to build a 26-20 lead with 7:57 left in the half. The Bison suffered a terrible scoring drought that spanned nearly 13 minutes before finally notching a field goal with 15:44 left in the second half.

With the scoreboard showing the team down by as many as 20, Bucknell showed its championship heart and never say die attitude as they used the final 3:27 of the game to mount one of the greatest stretches in Bison basketball history. Lehigh was leading 65-46 before Creamer took over the game by scoring 14 unanswered points, including two huge three pointers with multiple Mountain Hawk defenders in her face. The Orange and Blue defense responded to her effort and swarmed Lehigh's attack, making key steals and refusing to let its offense advance the ball past half court. Creamer continued to dominate by scoring the next five points of the contest and brought Bucknell within three, 65-68. The run ended in heartbreak as Lehigh converted 6-6 from the free-throw line to seal the victory and spoil the comeback.

Creamer also had a big impression on the record books as her 35 points set a school record for most career 30-point games and also helped her to set a new career conference scoring record of 2,078 points. The young frontcourt of Smith, Mary Edwards '06, and Jennie Ruth '06 held its own against Tierney, limiting here well below her season average in points, but surrendered 17 rebounds to the Lehigh standout.

The players enjoyed playing in the new 4,000-seat Sojka Pavilion.

"Playing in the new arena was really exciting," Creamer said. "It is big and beautiful, but still has an intimate feel like Davis, which is really a nice combination. I feel very fortunate to have played in Davis and now in Sojka; it's like the best of both worlds."

Chelsea Smith '06 is poised for action during the contest against Lehigh. Smith scored three field goals for the Bison during the game.

Bucknell lost a nail-bitter 75-74 to American University in the last women's game ever played at Davis Gym on Jan. 11. Fittingly, the game was close throughout giving fans and players one last feeling of intimacy, a trait synonymous with Davis Gym.

In the final 5:31, there were four ties and six lead changes, including two foul shots by Almind, giving Bucknell its last lead, 74-73, with 19 seconds remaining. American University's Katryn Costenbader sank a jumper with three seconds left and a desperation heave by Creamer bounced off the backboard as time expired.

Creamer scored 41 points, including a perfect 16-16 from the foul line, and added a career-best eight steals. Almind had a tremendous game with 19 points, 12 rebounds and a career-high seven steals in her first game back from a leg injury.

The Orange and Blue throttled Air Force 85-69 to boost their record to 5-6 on Jan. 2. Bucknell used a 23-4 run over the final 11 minutes to secure the victory. Creamer scored 30 points and added 11 assists for her second double-double of the season. Franks tallied 24 points to surpass the 1,000-point barrier with 1,014 career marks.

Bucknell overwhelmed Akron 64-49 to claim third place at the St. Peter's Holiday Classic Dec. 30. The Bison stampeded out of the gates with a 23-0 run and never looked back as they broke out of a three-game losing streak and improved to 4-6.

Molly Creamer heads for the basket against Lehigh on Jan. 15. On Jan. 4, Creamer reached the 2,000 career points mark.

Creamer led all scorers with 19 points and was later named to the All-Tournament team. Creamer has now received hardware from every regular season tournament she has participated in during her collegiate career. Katie Hettler '04 helped the Orange and Blue with a career-best seven rebounds and seven points and Edwards notched a season-high 13 points.

Bucknell fell to Long Island University 66-51, dropping its record to 5-7 Jan. 4. The Lady Bison could not buy a bucket as 11 points was the closest they came to the Blackbirds en route to shooting a dismal 19 percent in the second half. The one highlight Bucknell took from the game was that Creamer scored 20, placing her over the 2,000 career points plateau.

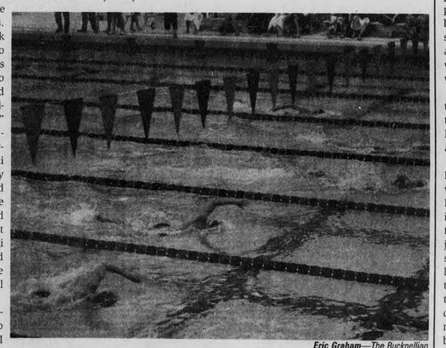
stepped up once again to win the 100 in a time of 59.92 and finished 2nd behind Altman (2:06.71) in the 200 for a 1-2 finish. The stroke group turned over wins in both the breaststroke events as well, as Flick finished the 100 in a time of 1:07.48, and the 200 in 2:26.44. These performances coupled with her addition to the medley relay earned her the Patriot League swimmer of the week honors.

"I was really fired up to walk into Colgate's pool and be able to perform so well," Flick said. "It is always a long trip up there and to dominate them the way we did was really exciting, I think it really took the wind out of their sails."

The women were unbeatable once again in the butterfly events as Krakowski (58.95) and Captain Becky Dolan '03 (1:02.48) finished 1st and 3rd in the 100 and the team of Feinthel, Dolan and Vanessa Scaringi '06 swept the 200. Golino and Scaringi ended the meet with second and third place finishes in the 200 individual medley to seal the win.

"After a lot of hard training we were really able to believe in ourselves and I think that is what brought this win. The team is highly prepared and the end of this season is shaping up to be triumphant," Assistant Coach Judson Aungst said. "Look for the Bison as they compete in their final dual meet against Lehigh at home on Saturday, Feb. 1.



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

The Bison compete at the Kinsey Natatorium on Jan. 11. They will compete in their final dual meet on Feb. 1 when they square off against Lehigh.

the Bison were not able to get an official attempt at the basket.

Bucknell shot 43 percent from the floor and converted on a season-high 11 of 25 three pointers, but was plagued by 20 miscues. Cornell shot 46 percent and won the battle of the boards 33-25. It was the first time this season that Cornell had won a game after trailing at the half. The Big Red was 0-8 prior to the victory, but 5-0 when leading at the intermission.

The Bison return to the hardwood tonight for a 7:45 affair with Army at the brand new Sojka Pavilion. Bettencourt is confident that perseverance is the key to a quick turnaround.

"In order to snap the losing streak I think the team just has to continue to work hard and we'll snap out of it," Bettencourt said. "I think the most important thing is that we remain confident and stick together. I think we just need to be patient and relax offensively. I think because we have been losing some games that everyone is trying so hard offensively to make things happen that we are all trying to do a little too much. I think once we relax and find a rhythm again we will be fine."

Harry Potter craze hits the nation and University

British author J.K. Rowlings' publisher announces fifth book in the bestselling series will be released June 21

By Alyson Walker
Features Editor

The fifth book of the Harry Potter series by British author J.K. Rowlings will be sold at bookstores starting June 21, according to an announcement by Rowlings' publisher last Wednesday. "Harry Potter and the Order of the Phoenix" hit the top of the bestsellers list only two hours after it was available to pre-order, according to Amazon.com.

A statement from both Britain's Bloomsbury Publishers and Scholastic Children's Books of the United States revealed very little about the plot of the 255,000-word book, which is one-third longer than the fourth book, "Harry Potter and the Goblet of Fire."

All that was revealed to Potter fans were a few quotes, including the opening lines of the book, "The hottest day of the summer so far was drawing to a close and a drowsy silence lay over the large, square houses of Privet Drive. ...The only person left outside was a teenage boy who was lying flat on his back in a flowerbed outside number four."

The publishers also tantalized fans by releasing this line from Hogwarts School headmaster Albus Dumbledore, "It is time ... for me to tell you what I should have told you five years ago, Harry. Please sit down. I am going to tell you everything."

Fans have been quite anxious to read the next book in the seven-book series that was originally anticipated for release last year. One American fan paid over $45,000 for a card with 93 words on it describing the plot of the book, including "Ron," "broomed" and "sacked," according to CBS.com.

Booksellers are also eagerly awaiting the book, and some chains are even planning special celebrations. Barnes & Noble will remain open on Friday, June 20 and begin selling the book at midnight.

Other sellers are excited for the impending sales, following a lackluster holiday season.

"It's an emotional lift, something to drive business and put books back in the news," said Carl Lennertz, publisher and program director of BookSense, a national marketing campaign for independent bookstores in the United States, to CBS.com.

It certainly appears that the book will increase sales. Amazon.com declined to share how many books have been pre-ordered, commenting only that it is over one hundred times the number of advanced sales for the fourth book, according to MSNBC.com.

> "What I really love about these books is that they are truly easy to read and understand—it transports the reader into a complex and exciting new world without making the story too complicated and confusing."
> —Justin Schwartz '04

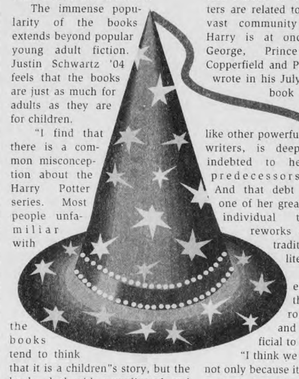
The first four Harry Potter books remain on bestseller lists globally. The books have been published in 55 languages and sold in over 200 countries, according to CBS.com. The first two books, "Harry Potter and the Sorcerer's Stone" and "Harry Potter and the Chamber of Secrets" have both been made into movies by Warner Bros. and grossed more than $1.7 billion combined.

The immense popularity of the books extends beyond popular young adult fiction. Justin Schwartz '04 feels that the books are just as much for adults as they are for children.



"I find that there is a common misconception about the Harry Potter series. Most people unfamiliar with the books tend to think that it is a children"s story, but the books deal with complicated and challenging issues," Schwartz said.

These issues are discussed by University students who are enrolled in Studies of Children's Literature. They read the first Harry Potter book as part of their curriculum. Professor of English Michael Payne discusses the popularity of the books in his book review of "Harry Potter and the Goblet of Fire" and Rowlings' impact upon children's literature.

"Perhaps the most lasting value for young readers of these books is the way they provide an understanding of how the world of literature works. In that world characters are related to each other in a vast community of the word. Harry is at once Beowulf, St. George, Prince Hal, David Copperfield and Peter Pan," Payne wrote in his July 8, 2000 Sunday book review column. "Rowling, therefore, like other powerful writers, is deeply indebted to her predecessors. And that debt is one of her great strengths. Her individual talent actively reworks and revises the tradition of children's literature."

Students enjoyed reading the text in a classroom atmosphere and felt it was beneficial to the course.

"I think we studied the book not only because it is an example of contemporary children's novels, but also because it includes classic themes from many eras of literature and introduces them to children. For this reason, I appreciate it more now than I did simply as a fan," Lacy Gonzalez '04 said.

Another important aspect of the Harry Potter books is the interaction it creates between different people who experience the books.

"The community of the word enables us and our children to read in order to know that we are not alone. The millions of children (and adults) who will soon be talking about the details of Harry's latest adventures know this already," Payne wrote.

Many relate to the books because of the appeal of main character Harry Potter. The orphan is raised with his Muggle (non-wizard) aunt, uncle and cousin, unaware of his magical heritage, until his 11th birthday, when he receives an invitation to Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry. The series follows Potter through his years at Hogwarts and his adventures with different characters, including his close friends Ron Weasley and Hermione Granger, as he fights against the evil wizard, Lord Voldemort, who is responsible for the deaths of Potter's parents and the scar on Potter's forehead. Potter will be 15 in the fifth book.

"As he develops a mature command of his magical powers, which are a combination of his imagination, intellect and innate moral sense, Harry gets to know that the ultimate fulfillment of his own inner drive lies in his positive relationship with others," Payne wrote. "In fact, it is because he is young, incomplete and often mistaken that he is such an appealing and believable character."

Others find that the themes of the stories make them appealing.

"What I really love about these books is that they are truly easy to read and understand—it transports the reader into a complex and exciting new world without making the story too complicated and confusing," Schwartz said. "The main themes of the book are very interesting and fun to read. Whenever I was reading the books, I was truly interested in the story and could not wait to hear the rest of it."

Racquetball is hit with faculty and staff

By Julianna Pietak
Senior Writer

It's lunchtime and, in the Fieldhouse, a collection of University faculty, staff and coaches are exercising their athletic side in a way some of them have done for over 15 years. Present are Professor Dick Ellis and Wayne McDiffett from the biology department; Cark Kirby, an associate professor of geology; George Waltman from engineering; John Kline of the R.O.T.C. program; and even Mike Jolin from the athletics equipment room. These men, and other players, meet at lunchtime and Wednesday nights each week for their common interest, racquetball.

Racquetball is a fast game played in an enclosed indoor court. It was originally developed from a combination of handball and squash and can be played with two people in singles, four for doubles or teams of three. Balls can reach speeds of 185 miles an hour in this amazingly fast and sometimes painful sport.

"Racquetball is a sport that any two evenly matched people can enjoy," Jim Hostetler, director of construction and design faculties, said.

Rebecca Helt, the University men's and women's tennis coach, said this sport appeals as "a lifelong sport."

"It is an easy sport for anyone to pick up if you're looking for a fun but challenging sport to become involved in," Helt said.

Perhaps it is this appeal that has held some of the players at the University for so long and has helped them achieve in the sport. Participants range from Bob Kurtis, still playing at the age of 67, to Helt, one of the younger, yet still accomplished, players.

That these players are accomplished is apparent through their various titles and future goals. What Hostetler calls "the all-star Wednesday night crowd" has four first place doubles in racquetball tournaments to their credit, as well as several medals from the Keystone Games.

Just one month ago, Hostetler and Helt took home a statewide first place in mixed doubles.

Future goals for the group include competing in the highest tournament level, open, and even moving on to compete regionally and nationally.

With such awards and competitions also come memories, fond and otherwise. Hostetler tells of having to get stitches twice. On a more humorous note, he also relates one of his favorite games within the game of racquetball, that of challenging younger contenders who are unaware of his history and success in the sport.

Driving these players to this level of involvement is their love of the sport. Helt described it as "great exercise and a constant challenge to learn new strategy and improve every day."

Hostetler said that it is "the adrenaline release and psychic therapy after everything stressful that goes on every day" that keeps him going.

Both add to this that racquetball is simply a lot of fun.

These same players have tournaments on campus each year to which University students are invited and welcome. According to Hostetler, student participation has significantly dropped off in recent years.

"It is a sport that simply isn't recognized enough," Helt said.

Despite this, there are clinics available every semester for an introduction to racquetball and accessible equipment in the Fieldhouse on a daily basis. For Helt, Hostetler and all the other players, this sport provides not only a daily release, but a lifelong source of fun and competition. Outside of their diverse daily roles of professors, coaches and University staff, these players all share a common love for a sport they wish to share with others.

Abroad perspective in Sevilla, España

By Meghann Peace
Contributing Writer

Sevilla, España. A land of blazing sun and intense heat, with palm, orange and olive trees set against a brilliant blue sky. A land of soaking rains and bitter, cold winds. A city that still carries remnants of the great Muslim Empire that ruled there for over five centuries. Narrow, twisting streets that wind amid the whitewashed and ceramic-decorated walls of the medieval Jewish homes. Roman ruins and a glorious gothic Christian cathedral, the third largest in the world. The river running alongside streets packed with bars. The religious and secular fiestas that attract visitors from nearly every corner of the world. The fluid dance of the bulls and the toreros. The passionate whirl of flamenco and the rhythm of the guitar. Sevilla—a city with inexpressible charm and allure.

I was lucky enough to live in this incredible place. I spent a semester in Sevilla, the capital city of Andalucía, which is the southern region of Spain. My program, the Sweet Briar College Junior Year in Spain, brought together over 40 Americans from different universities to study in the Universidad de Sevilla.

We had classes with Americans, and we also had the option to take classes with Spanish students. I studied Spanish medieval history, Spanish contemporary culture, Spanish grammar and the history and theory of flamenco with Americans, as well as Spanish phonetics with Spaniards.

The living arrangements provided us with placements in Spanish homes. I lived with a Spanish woman and a roommate from my program. This was an invaluable experience; it exposed me firsthand to the Spanish culture. I was in a Spanish home with all of its intrinsic customs. I didn't just study the culture, I lived it in my daily life.

This, of course, goes without mentioning how much my Spanish improved after living for nearly four months with a woman who speaks no English. I might add that dorms, other than not being a means of cultural exposure, just aren't realistic housing options. This is because there aren't any. In Spain, young adults generally live with their parents until they marry, and this includes while they're attending the university. There is no need for dorms, so they simply don't exist.

I traveled extensively throughout Spain during my time there. It's a country of astonishing variety, in culture, landscape, art, music, history, food and even language. Barcelona, Madrid, Toledo, Granada ... they're completely distinct from each other, and they all have their own singular appeal. I visited these and others, some of the most diverse cities in the country, and I could talk about them at length. However, Sevilla was my home. I loved it, and I want to write about why I did.

I loved Sevilla for its people. The Sevillanos are among the friendliest people I've ever met. They love to meet people and learn about them, and they will talk with anyone about nearly anything. I had conversations with strangers in the streets about the ancient Romans and the weather of Sevilla. I had 3 a.m. discussions about Spanish medieval history with my taxi drivers. I customarily walked into a store and left a half an hour later, having bought nothing, but full of new information about daily life in Spain. My Spanish friends taught me everything from slang to Spanish soccer to their thoughts on being members of the European Union. Everyone was only too happy to speak with me and teach me. I studied Spain in the classroom, but I learned about it in the streets.

> "This was my semester. I had the great opportunity to live in Sevilla among these marvels and with such fascinating people. I was able to devote almost four months to learning Spanish, studying the history and the culture of the country, and falling in love with my city."
> —Meghann Peace '04

I loved Sevilla for its sense of fun. The city has a worldwide reputation for gaiety and excitement, and you really only have to spend one weekend there to realize this. Bars and discotecas are found in nearly every neighborhood, and there are some streets that are entirely devoted to them.

On any Friday or Saturday night, it is not at all uncommon to find throngs of people of all ages and nationalities crowding the streets until 5 or 6 in the morning. Some nights, it seems as if the entire world has come to Sevilla to enjoy itself.

The street life in Sevilla is not something that happens only when the sun has set. During the day, one of the best things to do is to grab a seat at a sidewalk café or one of the many heladerías (ice cream shops), and people-watch.

One of the most pervasive customs in daily Spanish life is the paseo. The paseo is nothing more than a stroll around town, without a specific destination, and with no other purpose than to see and be seen. Giggling groups of teen-age girls, couples of every age, young mothers with baby strollers, businessmen on their lunch break, dog walkers, entire families ... if you stay in one place long enough with your coffee or your ice cream, there's no telling who or what you'll see.

I loved Sevilla for its history. We, as Americans, have a completely different concept of time than do the Europeans. What seems like an eternity to the average American is, to the sevillanos, barely a blink in the passing of the ages. When the Iberian Peninsula was a part of the Roman Empire, Sevilla was even then a city of importance. The peninsula then fell to the Visigoths, and three centuries later, it became a part of the Muslim Empire. Five centuries after that, it was taken by the Christian Reconquista.

Following the Middle Ages, it saw the dawning of the Spanish Empire. In this past century alone, it has experienced tremendous political upheaval, in the shift from a monarchy to a republic to a civil war to a dictatorship and finally to the current parliamentary monarchy.

Throughout this long and rich history, the Jewish and gypsy people have always lived in and influenced Sevilla. In the face of the different civilizations, cultures and people that have been there, the city of Sevilla has been forever maintained. To walk through this one city and see the footprints left by all of these people is to walk through over 2,000 years of history.

I loved Sevilla for its beauty. I crossed the Guadalquivir River every day to walk into town, and I often stopped on the bridge to gaze out over the water. I saw the palm trees and shrubbery that lined the river's course, and I could glimpse the already famous for its gothic architecture and sheer size, has one truly unique characteristic. It was built on the site of an old Muslim mosque. Although its builders destroyed much of the mosque, a small portion has survived. If you walk out a certain door in the cathedral, you will find yourself not in the streets, but in a patio of orange trees.

In the patio is the Giralda. The Giralda is the minaret of the old mosque, and it soars even higher than the cathedral, dominating the skyline. This Christian cathedral and its Muslim tower are symbols of the city.

When my parents came to visit me in Sevilla, we went to the roof of their hotel, where there was a balcony from which it was possible to see the city. The sun had set, and twilight was just falling. We turned around, and there we saw them. The cathedral and the Giralda, rising gracefully above the rooftops, lit and shining golden against the darkening sky. As we stared in awe at this vision, the silence was broken, as every bell in the Giralda began to ring. The sound resonated and vibrated through the velvety evening air, and I loved Sevilla more than I had ever loved it before.

This was my semester. I had the great opportunity to live in Sevilla among these marvels and with such fascinating people. I was able to devote almost four months to learning Spanish, studying the history and the culture of the country, and falling in love with my city.

It changed my life, more than I can ever describe, and I know that someday I will return to Sevilla. You see, I don't just want to do this, I have to. I need to go back because I left something of mine in the city. I left a part of myself in Sevilla, and there it will always remain.

Crane sings vocal variety

By Julianna Pietak
Senior Writer

Sunday night, Rachel Crane gave a rich and beautiful performance at her senior music recital. The pieces ranged in character from dramatic to lyrical to whimsical and humorous, but all were performed in a pleasing and professional manner.

The recital began with Francesco Mancini's "Mentre il cor si stilla in pianto," translated to "while my heart distills in weeping." This was a sad and not too heavy piece. With a change in songs came a change in mood as well with the next Italian song, "Mio cor, non sospirar," by Geminiano Giacomelli. This piece spoke of a sighing heart and, as such, had a lighthearted air, featuring many vocal melismas and runs. The final song in this set of Italian pieces was the heavier and dramatic "Rendimi il figlio mio," a mother's song of pleading by Leonardo Leo.

Following these three was a set of four shorter songs by French composer Franz Liszt, each set to lyrics by Victor Hugo. These ranged from the slow and lyrical "Oh, quand je dors" beginning the set, to the very expressive and rich "Enfant, si j'etais Roi," which closed this collection of songs. All were performed in a rich and expressive manner.

The first half of the performance was finished with Puccini's "Donde Lieta" from "La Boheme." This piece had many characteristics typical of the operatic style, with an almost conversational tone and the piano imitating the voice.

After a brief intermission, Crane returned to perform a set of German songs by Hugo Wolf. These began with the short and romantic "Verborgenheit," followed by the more playful, yet still expressive "In dem Schatten meiner Locken." "Verschwiegene," the third song in the set of five, was short yet filled with beautiful and colorful harmonies. This was followed by the heavier "Nimmersatte Liebe," and finally finishing off the set was the lighthearted and mischievous "Ich hab' in Penna einen Liebsten."

Staying true to the playful style of the preceding movement, Crane ended her program with a set of songs by Leonard Bernstein titled "I Hate Music (A Cycle of Five Kid Songs)." Each featured a text seemingly taken out of an elementary school journal and filled with child-like thoughts and humor. Musically, these classical sounding pieces played with atonality and interesting harmonies, furthering the expressive yet humorous air.

After the official program had ended, Crane returned with a cute and expressive encore featuring the thoughts of a "princess" and a "prima donna, donna, donna." Throughout the entire evening's program, Crane's performance was not only well executed and professional, but entertaining and highly enjoyable as well.

"Joe Millionaire" strikes it rich

By Kristi Johnston
Senior Writer

With the multitude of reality shows to choose from these days, it is hard to distinguish one from another. "Star Search" and "American Idol" are back, "The Bachelorette" has made its way onto television screens and the next "Survivor" is just around the corner. Amid all this confusion, it's a wonder anyone bothers to watch reality television at all.

Enter "Joe Millionaire," FOX's latest spin on the dating game. The concept of the show is similar to that of "The Bachelor"—one single man is introduced to 20 single women, and the fight for the marriage certificate ensues. "Joe Millionaire" has a twist—the women think they are meeting a man worth $50 million, when in fact, he has less money than they do.

Evan Marriott, "Joe Millionaire," is a construction worker who purportedly makes $19,000 per year. He eats fast food, had never ridden a horse and looks more like your average Joe than a millionaire. All this is kept secret from his potential brides, who arrive at a French chateau they think he owns, witness him ride in on the token white horse and attempt to impress him wearing designer gowns he supposedly provided.

During the debut episode, Marriott was introduced to the 20 hopefuls and spent time with each of them at a classy ball. Not a lot of interaction ensued, considering he had to eliminate eight women immediately.

In episode two, Marriott went on "dates" with the remaining women in groups of four. After these dates, Marriott narrowed down the pool to five remaining candidates. After Monday's show, that number was again reduced.

While "Joe Millionaire" has been one of the most watched shows on television since its debut, most of the gossip surrounding the show is directed toward its star. Entertainment Weekly reports that, before entering the world of construction, Marriott worked as an actor, a model and even a professional wrestler—a fact that the show's producers withheld from viewers. He also paid rent on a California home worth over $1 million, though he no longer lives there.

All this leaves viewers with an impression of "Joe Millionaire" that is unclear at best. But it is not what Marriott is really worth that makes this show so intriguing. "Joe Millionaire" is unique in the reality realm because the winner has a choice—will she choose penniless Marriott or walk away? Is it even possible for these women to get to know the real Marriott? No matter what, there is little doubt that America will be watching to find out.

Cap and Dagger, the University's student-led theater company, is presenting a musical theater revue entitled "Musicals of the '60s and '70s" this Saturday at 8 p.m. in the LC Forum. Auditions for the revue were held in October. Director Kim Klauder '05 was pleased at the auditions.

"All students who tried out received a part," Klauder said.

Sara Bradley '04 and Tim Wojton '03 assisted Klauder. Accompanists for the revue are pianists Colin Aherne '05 and Rae Purcell '05.

Three scenes and three songs will be presented from each of the following musicals:

"Jesus Christ Superstar," featuring Kyle McGee '03 and Aherne; "Camelot," featuring Sarah Houck '06 and Amir Sadaghiani '03; "Grease," featuring Jason Klechka '03 and Miriam Sincell '06; "Godspell," featuring Melissa Milanak '03 and Matt Baker '05; and "They're Playing our Song," featuring Klechka '03 and Klauder.

There are 24 Cap and Dagger members involved in the production, including the directors, coreographers and accompanists.

Jenevieve DeLosSantos '06, a featured singer in "Jesus Christ Superstar," said she has thoroughly enjoyed her experience with the musical theater production, and she hopes that the prospect of "seeing some of the University's most talented students," will entice people to come to the performance.

"The entire thing is student-run, and I think that shows how dedicated students can be," she said. "I think it's going to be a great show."

"Chicago" is a unique movie experience

By Jess Cortese
Senior Writer

At 20 years of age, it was impossible for me to see the 1975 musical "Chicago," so I will make no comparison of the movie to the stage production. It's OK though, because this creation of Rob Marshall's is no stage production. In fact, it's not even a movie—it's an explosion of light, sound and legs that is dizzying to the mind and dazzling to all other senses. It's truly an experience.

This experience takes place in Chicago in the 1920s, a world of darkness and crime where the law is a circus and Billy Flynn (Richard Gere) is its ringleader. The performer Velma Kelly (Catherine Zeta-Jones) is the opening act, both of the film and the circus, after she kills her sister and husband because they are having an affair. Roxie Hart (Renée Zellweger) is an adorable blonde firecracker who kills her lover and tries to have her unsuspecting husband (John C. Reilly) take the fall. Hart's legal needs upset the balance between Velma and Billy. Loads of singing and dancing ensue.

Roxie steals the press, the hearts of the people of Chicago and the attentions of the prime slick-talking lawyer again and again from Velma. But, whether or not Zellweger steals the show from Zeta-Jones is a whole other question. While both Zellweger and Gere give surprisingly apt and entertaining performances, Zeta-Jones has the perfect combination of dark, attention-hungry greed and pure star quality in her numbers. You can almost feel Velma's desperation to make it.

Reilly gives another notable and quite surprising performance as Amos Hart, a cuckolded husband who keeps coming back for more abuse. An average man ignored by his wife and those around him stands out amid the flash and glitter of the larger numbers in his simple rendition of "Mr. Cellophane." He is just part of what makes "Chicago" a jazz sensation that no one should miss. This production really has it all.

Good Luck John hospitalized

By Rachel Laskow
Senior Editor

John W. Throssel Jr., know as Good Luck John to the University community, was taken to Evangelical Community Hospital in an emergency services vehicle on Monday.

According to Mail Services Supervisor Art Moser, with whom Throssel has lived for the past 14 months, Throssel, 72, was not feeling well on Saturday night, Sunday and Monday morning. Moser said Throssel's behavior was not normal and that he very rarely misses church at Beaver Memorial United Methodist Church on 3rd Street.

Throssel was not able to stand up and admitted that he needed help. Moser believes that social services at the hospital will be able to aid Throssel.

"Hopefully they will be able to find a place for him to stay that will give him the help he needs," Moser said.

Doctors at the hospital have been helping Throssel stand and regain his strength. When the doctors offered him help, Throssel remained optimistic.

"I have to prove to myself that I can do it," Throssel said.

Throssel kept his sense of humor when the doctors noted he had a tough time getting on his feet.

"Are you talking figuratively?" Throssel asked.

Throssel also admitted that the hospital food was delicious, but candy bars are still his favorite.

"I better have three [candy bars] in my pocket. They're wonderful," Throssel said.

According to Ann Kline, secretary at Administrative Services, Throssel's health has been slipping for a few months now, especially with his walk and talk.

"From all I gathered from my daily talks with John, when he was able to come to campus, he thought he was going to be banned from campus, and I do think that was the start of his decline," Kline said.

Throssel has been visiting the University for the past 40 years, and is often seen walking on Route 15 and Market Street.

"The students really accept him and stand with him," Moser said.

Hunt Hall welcomes home sororities

Sororities move into building that receives first facelift since being built in 1928

Dan Fellon—The Bucknellian

By Meghan Fox
Staff Writer

On the second weekend of January, the University's Panhellenic women opened the doors to the newly renovated Hunt Hall, the official home of the University's seven sororities.

Immediately inside Hunt's doors is a white wall with each sorority's Greek letters plated in gold. Lined in wood framework, the lobby now contains an elevator and a red carpet that leads to a formal room.

"It's beautiful! It's like an old-fashioned hotel," Delta Delta Delta sister Samantha Berthod '04 said.

According to Dean of Students Richard Ferraro, although building renovations typically occur over the summer months, that would not have provided enough time for completion of the $3.8 million project.

"Hunt had not been renovated since it was built in 1928," Ferraro said, still recalling the green shag carpet that lined its floors when he first came to the University. "The heating was outdated and the pipes were banging."

The restoration of Hunt Hall began after Commencement last spring and was completed in January, shortly before students arrived back on campus for the spring semester.

"It was a pretty aggressive schedule. We were cutting it pretty close," Ferraro said.

Nevertheless, everything was finished according to plan.

"We redid all the systems, including the heating and cooling, and we kept a lot of the woodwork and the fancy wood trim," Ferraro said.

New additions also include an elevator, an informal room in the basement and a formal room on the main floor.

The formal room is furnished with couches and chairs and includes a dance floor and fireplace.

"It's a really nice area to have events in," Assistant Director of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Shauna Irwin said.

Sororities will be able to rent out the room for formal occasions and conferences may also be held there.

Throughout the rest of the building, each sorority is situated in its own wing.

"All of the suite rooms were redone and every corridor has been decorated in a choice of colors by the sorority," Irwin said.

The Greek symbols of each sorority also hang above the doorways of their respective wings.

Multiple thefts reported over break

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

Many students returning to campus following winter break were greeted with some unwelcome news. After opening their rooms in several residence halls around campus, they discovered that some valuable items were missing. Students are finding that their rooms are no longer completely safe and the University is racing to ensure this does not happen again.

In last week's Bucknellian, there were 27 incidents reported in the Public Safety Log. Of these incidents, 14 were thefts and there were several other trespassing incidents as well. The residence halls where thefts took place included Kalman-Posner in the Gateways, Trax Hall, Sigma Phi Epsilon Fraternity, Bucknell West, Swartz Hall, Sigma Alpha Epsilon Fraternity, Kress Hall, Kappa Delta Rho Fraternity, Vedder Hall and McDonnell Hall.

Residence hall rooms are never completely secure, even when students are in residence. Students frequently leave rooms unlocked and unattended for long periods of time and windows on ground floors open when they are not in the room.

In a telephone survey conducted last semester for Assistant Professor of Mathematics James H. Wright's Statistics 216 class, Kelsey Eagan '05, Kyle Menghetti '03, Kaitlin McGirl '05 and Phebe Taylor '05 reported that 34 precent of downhill residents, 20 percent of uphill residents, 93 percent of Bucknell West residents and 60 percent of Gateway residents do not lock their doors during the day. On average, students only lock their doors from one to five and a half hours during the day and two to six hours at night.

Officially, Public Safety blames several factors on the increased theft rate over the winter break. These factors included residence hall room doors and windows being left unlocked, fraternity members entering and exiting their houses with keys during the break, continued construction projects around the campus, illegal entries into rooms using keys and residents remaining in the halls as other residents went home for break early.

Public Safety also maintains that its officers "checked and locked all the buildings on campus at the beginning of the break, checked them throughout the break and issued advisories about securing rooms during the semester."

Director of Public Safety Vincent DeCerchio insisted that this year's increase in thefts is primarily due to student error.

"Too many students do not lock their doors or windows. Locking doors and windows is the first step towards good security. Residents should also place their valuables in an out-of-sight location and insure all valuable items against theft," DeCherchio said.

He also suggests that students "purchase a small foot locker for their room and lock valuables in this when they leave, or to even bring smaller items of value home with them." Students should also "consider purchasing renters' insurance for any of their items of value or place these items—as a rider—on their homeowners' insurance policies."

Students can also do several other things to keep their valuables secure. They should maintain a list of serial numbers and other identification information for their valuable possessions. Cash and other jewelry should be kept out of sight and any other valuable personal items should not be left on desks or on dressers during breaks. These items should be hidden well.

When asked about possible security improvements during break periods, DeCerchio said that the University and Physical Plant are looking into ways to make sure keys are only in the hands of the right people. They are considering creating a higher level of accountability for staff who have access to the residence halls and monitoring those facilities to make them more secure.

DeCerchio would not comment specifically on the progress of any investigations into the string of thefts.

"We are actively investigating these thefts. With proper evidence, we will prosecute and terminate any person or persons responsible for these acts," DeCerchio said.

The rash of thefts over break is not unusual.

"We have always had some thefts over breaks, mostly in unsecured areas or rooms. I am still uncertain as to why we had more this year. We are seeking to examine all our security measures during break to see how we can improve them in the future."

ISR continues improving systems

By Matt Ellis
News Editor

The University's Information Services and Resource Center (ISR) made multiple changes over winter break to improve the network and Internet capabilities, as well as the security of the campus' Internet systems.

The two major changes were an expansion of the University's wireless service and a changing and protection of everyone's logon password.

Currently, Dana Engineering, Bertrand Library, the Bison, Bostwick Dinning Hall, 7th Street Café, the Writing Center and Olin 475 are wireless.

"Over time we expect to increase the number of places on campus where wireless networking is available. We began with a small pilot project last spring that involved a couple of locations on campus and a small number of users," Bryan Hoyt, director of technology integration, said. "Over the course of this spring, we will be working with the campus community to identify keys areas of the campus for the next round of growth in wireless coverage. We hope to begin the next round of expansion later this spring or over the summer."

Wireless connections allow speed, convenience and portability to any student or faculty member that has a supportable wireless card.

"Wireless network connections are shared connections and generally slower than 'wired' connections," Hoyt said. "However, the vast majority of users who use the wireless network to read e-mail and browse the Web will not notice a significant difference."

To have a wireless connection, it is necessary to have a supportable network card.

"In order to use wireless you must have an 802.11b compliant wireless network card. Wireless network cards come in many brands and styles. ISR strongly recommends a Cisco Systems Aironet 350 Wireless card or an Apple Airport card using software version 1.3.1 or above. With these cards ISR will do everything we can to get them [students, faculty and staff] connected to the network," Hoyt said.

The Cisco Systems Aironet cards will be available through the University Bookstore, and Apple Airport cards are available online.

ISR is not looking to replace the current network system with a wireless system, but is instead looking to complement the current system with the new wireless system.

Wireless users do have to be more aware of security issues because a wireless connection is typically not as secure as a wired connection.

"Wireless users are encouraged to change their passwords often and be more cautious and aware of security issues. Wireless users should also understand that certain locations will have better connections than others because of the propagation patterns of the radios involved and interference from other radio transmissions," Hoyt said.

ISR also changed everyone's network passwords over break.

"Over the winter break a hacker was able to exploit a security weakness in the operating system on one of our servers and break into that server. In the process of breaking into the server, we believe this individual gained access to the password database which was

David Van Wagener '06 suffered a broken neck and damaged spinal cord after a skiing accident in Breckenridge, Colo., on Dec. 20, 2002.

According to a Web site posted by Van Wagener's family, it was immediately determined on the ski slopes that he was paralyzed from the shoulders down. Within 60 minutes of his fall, Van Wagener was airlifted to St. Anthony's Trauma Center in Denver. He was diagnosed with a crushed C4 vertebra and a broken C5 vertebra.

According to the Web site, "The combination of the C4 impact plus other swelling and contusions resulted in severe damage to the spinal cord in the C4/C5 area."

Van Wagener is currently being treated at Craig Hospital in Englewood, Colo.

"Surgery was done quickly to rebuild and fuse the damaged vertebrae. From that point, David began a journey of personal courage—helped by outstanding medical teams as well as support and prayer from many people all over the world," according to the Web site. "David is going at this injury with the same quiet determination that he has always exhibited. He faces significant challenges, but remains optimistic about his long-term potential."

The University is keeping track of Van Wagener's progress.

"David's attitude has been very courageous and inspirational throughout his recovery ... we are very optimistic that he will make a healthy recovery and return to school as soon as he can," Assistant Dean of Students Amy Badal said.

When students returned to school after winter break, Class of 2006 President Paul Wolujewicz sent out a notice to all first-year students that said Van Wagener was able to breathe on his own and had recovered some feeling in his chest, shoulders and biceps.

Individual students, the Class of 2006 as a whole and the entire campus community have rallied together to support Van Wagener's recovery.

The 2006 class officers recently sent Van Wagener a get well package that included a Bucknell blanket, compact discs and a sweatshirt.

In addition, hundreds of members of the first-year class wrote messages of encouragement and support on a large banner that was sent to Van Wagener last week.

According to Badal, a goal was established to send something to Van Wagener each week until he is able to return to campus.

"David had an outstanding first semester. He loved Bucknell and people loved him. We are hopeful that with great care from the hospital and David's determination, he will make a very substantial recovery. People are doing their best to keep David in their thoughts and prayers," Dean of Students Richard Ferraro said.

Friends of Van Wagener describe him as courageous, adventurous, determined and someone who we should all respect.

The Van Wagener Web site includes updates, messages and notes from friends and loved ones. The URL is: http://www.dbdoctor.net/david/.

Van Wagener also posts statements on the Web site.

"I am amazed by the interest and support from friends all over the world, including many of whom I have never met. Your concern and prayer help me keep climbing the hill," David wrote on his Web site.

"David has a rare combination of humor, intelligence, fortitude and caring that have been shaped by family, friends and travel. He has very diverse interests, including Chinese and Japanese, that were cultivated by spending eight of his formative years in Asia. At the end of the day, he is the rare scientist with a thirst for adventure, fun and camaraderie," according to the Web site.

If students wish to send a card or any other item to Van Wagener, they can simply drop it off at Badal's office, 211 LC. Postage and mailing will be provided by the school.

stored on that machine, thereby compromising everyone's password," Hoyt said.

ISR said it takes every precaution necessary to secure the campus' systems, but with Internet attacks becoming more prevalent, they are also becoming harder to prevent.

According to the Computer Emergency Response Team at Carnegie Mellon University, the leading national center of Internet security expertise, between 1994 and 2001 reported Internet hacking incidents have increased from 2,340 to 52,658.

"The only sure way to protect ourselves from these hackers and other types of Internet attacks would be to greatly restrict the University's servers and network from being accessed from the Internet. However, we are an academic community and academic communities are founded on the principles of openness and access to information," Hoyt said. "Consequently, we are constantly trying to find the appropriate balance between accessibility and security. Or, put another way, we are continually trying to balance the culture of openness with the need to have the computing environment be secure."

An important part of making a computer secure is changing all passwords frequently. Often passwords can be easily stolen with keystroke-recording tools installed on machines or network traffic sniffing tools.

"We recommend that individuals change their password at least three times per year. When people change their passwords they should take measures to make that password as secure as possible," Hoyt said.

Guidelines for creating secure passwords can be found under the "Accounts and Passwords" link on the ISR home page.

S. Korea takes steps to stabilize N. Korean nuclear threats

By David LaRoss
Staff Writer

More than a month after North Korea began a standoff with the United States over its nuclear program, South Korea has stepped into a leading role to stabilize the situation. Those efforts have met with only marginal success—the three-day-long negotiations that ended Jan. 24 produced only a joint statement that said the two states will "cooperate toward a peaceful resolution to this problem."

An envoy from outgoing South Korean President Kim Dae-jung met with North Korean leaders Kim Yong Nam and Kim Jong-Il on Tuesday, according to the Associated Press. No details of the meeting have been released, except that it relates to "pending inter-Korean issues."

"North Korea kept contending that this nuclear issue should be resolved through dialogue with the United States," South Korean spokesman Rhee Bong Jo said to the Associated Press.

The United States has repeatedly refused to enter into direct negotiations with North Korea, instead pushing for the involvement of the U.N. Security Council.

"To refer the North Korean problem to the Security Council would be seen by North Korea as an attempt to put pressure on it," Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Aleksandr Losyukov said, according to the Associated Press.

He also said that economic sanctions—one of the chief weapons of the council—could be considered "an act of war" by North Korea.

"We believe that the problem that exists in North Korea is not a U.S.-D.P.R.K. [Democratic People's Republic of Korea] problem. Other nations are involved," Secretary of State Colin Powell said to The New York Times.

North Korea has repeatedly demanded a nonaggression treaty with the United States, often claiming that there are plans to begin a war against North Korea as an extension of U.S. action against Iraq.

The United States' standoff with North Korea is now nearly four months old. It began in early October, when North Korean officials told a U.S. delegation that their country had a covert nuclear weapons program—a statement that the North Korean government has consistently denied. In November, the United States, Japan and South Korea stopped sending the state oil, as per a 1994 agreement in which North Korea agreed to freeze its nuclear program.

Fed holds rates steady, citing geopolitical risk

With the possibility of war looming over the economy and stock market, the Federal Reserve left short-term interest rates unchanged at their lowest levels in more than 40 years on Tuesday. After a two-day meeting led by Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan, central bankers also left their monetary policy stance unchanged, saying the economic climate should improve gradually as the current "geopolitical risks" recede.

Bush sells vision of hydrogen future

Using the national spotlight to sell a technology still foreign to most Americans, President Bush on Tuesday proposed a $1.2 billion program to help build the infrastructure needed to revolutionize the cars we drive. The goal is to replace the polluting internal combustion engine with battery-like fuel cells that run on nonpolluting hydrogen. But obstacles exist, and the long time frame has environmentalists worried that more immediate action will be ignored.

United States to track data for bioterror signs

ATLANTA—The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention is developing a computerized network to gather a broad variety of information on illnesses to provide an early warning of a bioterror attack. The system would gather data on visits to doctors' offices and emergency rooms, drugstore sales and calls to poison control centers in major U.S. cities.

Study: Cell phones "blind" drivers

WASHINGTON—Drivers who use cell phones, even with a "hands-free" device, suffer from a kind of tunnel vision that endangers themselves and others, researchers said on Monday. Legislation that seeks to make mobile telephone use by drivers safer by mandating the use of a hands-free device may be providing a false sense of security, they warned.

A new trend in international education: abroad in Cuba

By Jason Oster
Staff Writer

It might come as a surprise to hear that more colleges and universities across the nation, including Bucknell, are starting study abroad programs in Cuba. When college students are deciding where they want to go abroad, many choose Western European countries. Countries that have maintained good standing with the U.S. government and are romanticized by the media are usually among the more popular choices for students, including the United Kingdom, France, Spain and Germany. Even when students decide to stay in the Western Hemisphere, Cuba has long been overlooked as an option. In a growing number of recent cases, this trend is changing.

Currently, the University International Education Office offers two options to students who want to travel to the only communist nation in the Western Hemisphere. One program is through Butler University, where students stay at the University of Havana. The University of Havana is the oldest and largest school in Cuba and hosts students from around the world. The other choice is via the School for International Training. Out of Havana, this program allows students to study with the University of Havana's Latin American Facility of Social Sciences.

According to a report by CNN, Cuba allowed 905 students to visit during the 2000-2001 academic year, which is a 64 percent increase from the preceding year. This number is expected to grow.

Peggy Blumenthal, the vice president of educational services at the Institute of International Education, said she believes that part of Cuba's attraction is mystique about a country that previously has been inaccessible to American students.

Last semester, Emily Park '04 opted to take advantage of this opportunity to go to Cuba, choosing to study at the School for International Training. The main obstacle in traveling to Cuba is receiving the U.S. government's approval.

"I needed to get a special visa through the Department of Treasury Office of Assets Control, which reinterpreted the rules of traveling in Cuba," Park said. "With the School for International Training, each individual needed their own license from the Department of Treasury. Some colleges provided it for their students going to this program."

Professor of Geography Paul Susman agreed that it is difficult to obtain all the paperwork for U.S. students traveling to Cuba. He said that the restrictions placed on U.S. travelers to Cuba are by their own government.

"U.S. citizens are prohibited from spending more than a limited amount of money per day and may not use credit cards in Cuba, although everyone else who visits Cuba from the rest of the world uses credit cards," Susman said.

Park did not share the fears that some would have about traveling to Cuba.

"I believe it is safe for Americans to travel to Cuba and I never sensed anti-American sentiment. The people were warm and welcoming. Cubans know there is a difference between the American people and the American government," Park said.

Susman, who also recently traveled to Cuba, agrees with Park.

"Tourism has grown significantly in recent years in Cuba and the Cuban government wants to ensure that it continues. I know of no safety concerns for visitors or students," Susman said.

Park said what struck her the most about the Cubans' pacifism is a picture she saw of Castro that read "Against Terrorism, Against the War." This comes from a country that takes in students from around the world and teaches them about rural health care for free. The only stipulation is that the students return to their home countries and use what they learned to help the less fortunate.

"There is a general pacifism among the people. Cubans are actually afraid that they are next on the Americans' hit list of the 'Axis of Evil,'" Park said.

Not everyone sees Cuba as a pacifistic country that is trying to make peace with the United States after embargoes placed on the island nation. Omar Lopez, a spokesman for the Cuban American National Foundation, a Miami based organization of anti-Castro exiles, told CNN that Castro is using U.S. students who travel to Cuba. According to Lopez, the Castro government is trying to place a "charm offensive" aimed at the United States with the intention of having the embargo lifted.

A growing number of U.S. educators and students find Cuba to be a peaceful and exciting archipelago that should be opened more to U.S. citizens. It still remains to be seen whether students will continue the recent trend, especially if the U.S. government continues to make it hard on those hopefuls who would like to study in Castro's Cuba.

"Oh, I really do [miss the University students]," Throssel said.

Brandy Fetters '03 visited Throssel at the hospital.

"He has played such an integral role at Bucknell. He's been here since I was a freshman. I heard he was sick and wanted to pay him a visit because he is such an inspiration," Fetters said.

Kline enjoys Throssel's enthusiasm for life and his vision of going to Israel to start a ministry.

"John likes coming to the University because he loves being around students who want to make a difference in the world," Kline said.

Throssel still has faith and it is one of his goals to remove fighting throughout the world.

"I see the great God. He always says he'll never forsake me and never leave me. If you use your common sense and faith, you never have to worry," Throssel said.

Throssel said that people have to make it up in their minds that they are not going to fight and then move on.

"I'm not going to give up," Throssel said.

Throssel remembered the last Bucknellian article about him and asked for copies of the article to be brought to his hospital room.

"My sister asked, 'How did they cover that much ground in an article?'" Throssel said.

Before leaving, I said, "I have to go now and write an article."

"Are you writing another article? That may be the answer," Throssel said.

Throssel sang songs in his hospital room and as we left the room, said, "Good luck."

University limits outside gym memberships

Pollock: University is looking at ways to allow memberships without taking away from student usage of the RAC gym

By Jennifer Jenchura
Senior Writer

A moratorium is currently in effect on all new memberships to the new Recreation and Athletics Center (RAC). The University is not allowing any new outside memberships, including 12-month, six-month or senior citizen, until it develops a fair pricing policy and resolves other issues including usage rates.

General access is monitored by checkers at the welcome station in order to evaluate student, faculty and staff usage of the RAC. A breakdown of the usage rates will help University administrators make any new decisions on outside memberships. The University now expects to implement any new policies in July 2003.

Although the RAC was designed primarily for student use, administrators realize the need to study the issue of increased demand for outside memberships. Due to the winter break and the limited amount of time students have been on campus between November and January, there has not been enough time to monitor student usage.

"We don't know now with any certainty that there will be a policy change. But we have known that we needed to study the issue since the RAC was first designed. One month or two, only in winter weather, does not constitute an adequate review period," Vice President of Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 said.

Due to the increased usage of the RAC, a more accurate breakdown of peak times and users is still pending. Last week the average daily use was 1,900 people.

"Next month we will do a survey to get a breakdown by students (including student-athletes), staff, faculty, guests and outside members, etc., as well as times of usage. General access is monitored by the checkers/monitors at the welcome station. We also have a small fitness staff who monitor the actual fitness areas. We spot-check the number of people entering the RAC," Pollock said.

Although community interest in obtaining memberships to the RAC has increased since its opening last fall, a moratorium will be placed on new community memberships. The University renewed only memberships obtained prior to the fall 2002 semester.

Being a local University alumnus or alumna does not increase a community member's chances of receiving a membership either.

"There are 20 Bucknell alumni included among the 226 individual memberships, and six among our 31 family memberships. We also have a list of 567 senior citizens (over age 65) who are eligible to use our recreational facilities because of past use, but we estimate that only 80 of these people actually take advantage. I don't know how many are alumni. Incidentally, alumni are no different than anyone else in relation to obtaining membership, although their fee is only half of the non-alumni fee," Pollock said.

There are also no exceptions to the policy for local Lewisburg High School students, as only those who are dependents of Bucknell faculty and staff with a Bucknell ID are permitted to use the RAC.

Bucknell students and staff as well as community members with valid memberships will still be allowed to bring guests to the gym, as long as requested in advance.

The Town-Gown Committee has responded favorably to the current policy.

"When people understand that we are studying usage and getting answers to liability and other questions, all in order to protect the interests of our students, every single one has been supportive. They all hope we can find a way to continue to permit outside memberships, but then so do we. Still, we need more time to know," Pollock said.

University General Counsel Wayne Bromfield, Pollock and several members of the Department of Athletics and Recreation are doing most of the work on the membership issue. Safety, insurance liability and complex tax issues are also being worked out.

"When we have a recommendation, I will take it to the president and appropriate governance committees for their review," Pollock said.

The University is interested in finding out if it will be able to add any new memberships, not if it will have to decrease eliminate current memberships.

"We ask for everyone's patience as we work through these and other questions related to RAC memberships. We have no current intention to subtract memberships if we are not required to do so," Pollock said. "The main issue before us concerns our ability to allow additional memberships safely and without displacing our students, for whom the facility was built."

Dan Fellon—The Bucknellian

The University is currently not allowing any new outside memberships until a fair pricing policy has been decided on.

The current interim policy

-Outside members who were enrolled for the fall 2002 semester have been renewed for the spring 2003 semester at the previous six-month rate.

-A moratorium is in effect on all new memberships. The University is not allowing any new outside memberships (12-month, six-month or senior citizen) until it has developed a pricing policy and resolved other issues.

-Current lifetime members will continue to be allowed to use the Gerhard Fieldhouse. But those memberships will not be extended to the RAC until the University determines usage patterns and resolves related issues.

-College-age students from other colleges and universities will be permitted to use the University's athletics and recreation facilities during school vacation periods by showing a valid college/university picture ID to the front desk security monitor.

-Student, faculty and staff access remains unchanged and only dependents of Bucknell faculty and staff with a Bucknell ID are permitted to use the RAC.

Recent robberies raise questions about campus security

Upon returning from winter break, students reported an overwhelming amount of theft to Public Safety. These reports were not isolated, as they affected the entire campus, including uphill and downhill dormitories, fraternities, the Gateways and the Mods. In many of the reports, the burglarized student claimed to have locked his or her door and window, which begs the question of how the rooms were entered.

The apparent disparity between robbery reports and supposedly secure rooms raises several safety issues on campus, especially since the locks on the outer doors of dormitories are changed over break and these buildings are supposed to be locked at all times.

Amid the discussions, or even controversy, of the "Bucknell family" and the safety of Lewisburg, several may take for granted the security of the campus. It is not uncommon to leave your books in the library and find them there several hours later, or even leave your door unlocked in comfort while taking a shower. This sense of security has become an expectation from the community, and any deviation from this would only be met by upset students and faculty. However, there are several possible solutions to remedy questions of campus security.

One such solution is installing a digital security system across campus, in which swiping of a University ID would allow entrance into all residential and academic buildings. Such a system would not only prevent unauthorized access, but also keep records of traffic through buildings. Furthermore, if the University really wanted to become "Big Brother," tracking sensors in ID cards could be used to monitor students' locations around campus. (Yes, this technology currently exists.)

Certainly students, and probably the University, would not want such an extreme campus security system. If implemented, the valued sense of community would be replaced with a "campus of fear" mentality. The University would be just another one of those campuses that students need a key card to enter any building. Fortunately, there are several intermediate measures that can be taken without such a drastic approach to security. These measures are the responsibility of both the University and students.

In a specific example from last week's Public Safety Log, windows appeared to be a common example of a burglar's entry point into a residence. Upon further consideration, it appeared that residence hall windows, generally speaking, are very susceptible to burglary. Whether it's windows in Roberts Hall, which have rotting frames and weak panes, or those in McDonnell Hall, which are extremely complicated and difficult to open or close, many of the windows have weaknesses that allow for relatively easy entry. All such windows should be immediately repaired, and, if needed, replaced.

Another possibility to limit theft on campus is to monitor the locking of residence halls more closely. While Public Safety does lock the halls at night, often one of the many entrances into a residence hall can be found unlocked, or even propped open with rocks.

Students also have a small but important responsibility in helping to limit theft on campus. Simple things like locking doors and windows and not propping outside doors could easily deter a burglar. And, in the case of a robbery, making sure that valuables are covered under homeowners' insurance or purchasing insurance on individual items are definitely worthwhile investments.

As members of this University community and residents of Lewisburg, we are fortunate to be in a unique and trusting environment in which we do not have to fear for the safety of ourselves or our possessions. It is our responsibility to maintain this environment by taking the precautions to preserve it.

Generosity impresses propective parents

To the Editor:

My wife and I recently accompanied our son Dan to Bucknell. A prospective college student, he was touring the campus and attending an interview. We had some free time on hand, and as it was noon, we decided to sample the food at the cafeteria. As we approached the register, the cashier asked us if the Admissions Office gave us a white discount card. After we replied that we did not receive one, a student waiting in line behind us offered to pay for our meals. She explained that she always has extra food credits at the end of the month, and they would only go to waste if we did not use them. We gladly accepted her generous offer and insisted that we reimburse her. However she said that the reimbursement was not necessary, and quickly went on her way.

This student's act of kindness reflects very favorably upon the character of the students at Bucknell and was very much appreciated by us.

State of the Union: the lost draft

A parody of what President George W. Bush meant to say last Tuesday in his address before Congress

By Peter Hackeman
Opinions Editor

Mr. Speaker, Vice President Cheney, members of Congress, distinguished citizens and fellow citizens, every year, by law and by custom, we meet here to consider the state of the union. This year, we gather in this chamber deeply aware of decisive days that lie ahead.

You and I serve our country in a time of great consequence. During this session of Congress, we have the duty to reform domestic programs vital to our country; we have the opportunity to save millions of lives abroad from a terrible disease. We will work for a prosperity that is broadly shared, and we will declare war on every country I don't like.

During the last two years we have seen what can be accomplished when we become bogged down in partisan bickering.

To lift the standards of our public schools, we achieved historic education reform, which must now be carried out in every school and in every classroom so that every child in America takes 147 standardized tests each year.

To protect our country, we reorganized our government and created the Department of Homeland Security, which is hopelessly complex and years away from being effective.

To bring our economy out of recession, we delivered the largest tax relief in a generation. It didn't work.

To insist on integrity in American business, we passed tough reforms, and we are holding corporate criminals to account, including some of my closest friends and advisers.

Some might call this a good record. I call it doing to America what I did to Texas. Tonight I ask the House and the Senate to join me in the next bold steps to serve our fellow citizens.

Our first goal is clear: We must have an economy that enriches the rich, pays lip service to the middle class and oppresses the poor.

Jobs are created when the economy grows; the economy grows when Americans have more money to spend and invest; and the best and fairest way to make sure Americans have that money is not to tax it away in the first place.

I am proposing that all income taxes be eliminated next year—all of them.

And under my plan, as soon as I've signed the bill, the government will stop providing many vital services to our citizens.

Lower taxes and greater investment will help this economy expand. More jobs mean more taxpayers and higher revenues to our government. As many of you know, the Republican Party and I have always wanted to raise government revenue.

A growing economy and a focus on essential priorities will be crucial to the future of Social Security. As we continue to work together to privatize Social Security, we must offer younger workers a chance to opt out of the system and leave our seniors without any help.

Our second goal is affordable health for all Americans. Americans should be able to purchase health at neighborhood convenience stores and local gas stations.

The American system of medicine is a model of skill and innovation, with a pace of discovery that is adding good years to our lives. Yet for some people, medical care costs too much, and many have no coverage at all. This does not concern me. These people are lazy and irresponsible; it's their own fault.

These problems will not be solved with a nationalized health care system that dictates coverage and rations care. Instead, we must work toward a system in which HMOs decide if it's profitable for patients to continue living.

To improve our health care system, we must address one of the prime causes of higher cost: the outrageous prices pharmaceutical companies charge for brand name medicines while preventing generic drugs from entering the marketplace. My stance on this issue may surprise my many pharmaceutical campaign contributors, but I've already gotten all the money I need from them.

Our third goal is to promote energy independence for our country, while dramatically eliminating the environment.

I have sent you a comprehensive energy plan to drill everywhere. If you won't let me drill in Alaska, we will continue down the list and drill in Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado and so on until the oil companies are happy.

I have sent you a healthy forest initiative to help prevent the catastrophic fires that devastate communities. Once the logging companies cut down all the trees in this country, forest fires will no longer be a threat.

Our fourth goal is to apply the compassion of America to the deepest problems of America. Americans are doing the work of compassion every day: visiting innocent prisoners on death row that I refuse to pardon, providing shelter for battered women and bringing companionship to lonely seniors.

Last year, I called on my fellow citizens to participate in the USA Freedom Corps. Unfortunately, no one called back to volunteer.

Tonight I ask Congress and the American people to focus the spirit of service and the resources of government on the needs of some of our most vulnerable citizens: boys and girls trying to grow up without guidance and attention and children who have to go through a prison gate to be hugged by their mom or dad. I remember what I felt like when my dad had to bail me out for my DUI.

Another cause of hopelessness is addiction to drugs, a subject I know much about. Addiction crowds out friendship, ambition, moral conviction and reduces all the richness of life to a single destructive desire; in my case, scoring some more cocaine.

As a government, we are fighting illegal drugs by cutting off supplies and redirecting them to the White House. We are also spending millions and millions of dollars on ineffective anti-drug ads during the Super Bowl.

Tonight, let us bring to all Americans who struggle with drug addiction this message of hope: If I can do it, so can you.

The qualities of courage and compassion that we strive for in America also determine our conduct abroad. Our founders dedicated this country to the cause of human dignity, the rights of every person and the possibilities of every life. This conviction leads us into the world to conquer and enslave the weak, defend the powerful and confuse the Europeans.

In the Middle East, we will continue to do nothing to end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

As our nation moves troops into every country it can find and forgoes alliances, we must also remember our calling, as a blessed country, is to make the world better and more like America.

Ladies and gentlemen, seldom has history offered a greater opportunity for us to anger every other country in the world.

This nation can lead the world in sparing innocent people from a plague of nature. By the way, nature has now been added to my "Axis of Evil."

There are days when our fellow citizens do not hear news about the war on terror. There's never a day when I do not learn of another threat, or receive reports of operations in progress or give an order in this global war to put innocent lives in danger.

The war goes on, and we are winning. It's fun; I like it.

To date we have arrested or otherwise dealt with many key commanders of al-Qaida. They include a man who directed logistics and funding for the September the 11th attacks, an al-Qaida operations chief from Southeast Asia, a key al-Qaida operative in Europe, a major al-Qaida leader in Yemen, a random Muslim man in Ohio and some Bucknell University students who are from Saudi Arabia.

And many others have met a different fate. Let's put it this way: They are no longer a problem to the United States and our friends and allies. [Make throat-slitting gesture.]

We are working closely with other nations to prevent further attacks. We've broken al-Qaida cells in many European cities, including Hamburg and Milan and Madrid and London and Paris and Buffalo, N.Y.

We've got the terrorists on the run. We're keeping them on the run. One by one the terrorists are learning the meaning of Texas justice: Shoot first and ask questions later.

And this year, for the first time, we are beginning to field a defense to protect this nation against ballistic missiles. Unfortunately, the system really doesn't work, but we'll just keep that between you and me.

I thank the Congress for supporting these measures. I ask you tonight to add to our future security with a major research and production effort to guard our people against bio-terrorism, called Project BioDome. Pauly Shore has agreed to lead our effort.

Today, the gravest danger in the war on terror, the gravest danger facing America and the world, is outlaw regimes that seek and possess nuc-u-lear, chemical and biological weapons.

Throughout the 20th century, small groups of conservative men seized control of great nations, built armies and arsenals, and set out to dominate the weak and intimidate the world. I've been quite successful, wouldn't you say? I want to thank Jeb, Sandra Day O'Connor and the rest of the Supreme Court for legalizing my coup.

Once again, this nation and our few remaining friends are all that stand between a world at peace, and a world of chaos and constant alarm. By the way, today is code orange on our security chart: Don't panic, but please be vigilant.

Different threats require different strategies. In Iran we continue to see a government that represses its people, stifles debate and imprisons people without trial. Oops, that was us ...

Almost three months ago, the United Nations Security Council gave Saddam Hussein his final chance to disarm. He has shown instead utter contempt for the United Nations and for the opinion of the world, just like I did the first year of my administration.

Then, 108 U.N. inspectors were sent to conduct a scavenger hunt for hidden materials across a country the size of California. They didn't find anything, but I need an excuse to go to war. So now I'm demanding that Iraq show exactly where it is hiding its banned weapons, lay those weapons out for the world to see and destroy them as directed before we invade them.

Our intelligence sources tell us that Saddam has attempted to purchase high-strength aluminum tubes suitable for nuclear weapons production, but they were actually to be used for those low-tech phones with string connecting two aluminum cans. You know, where you can hear what the other person says when you hold it up to your ear.

Saddam Hussein has not credibly explained these activities. He clearly has much to hide. Just what are these string-and-can phones to be used for?

If this is not evil, then evil has no meaning.

And tonight I have a message for the brave and oppressed people of Iraq: Your enemy is not surrounding your country, your enemy is ruling your country. And the day he and his regime are removed from power will be the day of your liberation. Then you can live under a Western government that exploits you for your oil: Isn't that what you have always wanted?

This nation fights reluctantly because we know the cost. I think everyone can see from my rhetoric that I'm reluctant to go to war.

We seek peace. We strive for peace. I, George W. Bush, love peace. If I could have one thing for the world, it would be world peace.

But, if we are able to provoke a war, we will fight in a just cause and by just means, sparing, in every way we can, the innocent. I'm just kidding. There is no such thing as an innocent person in Iraq.

And if we are able to provoke a war, we will fight with the full force and might of the U.S. military, and we will prevail. Heck, we spend more on our military every year than every other country combined.

We Americans have faith in ourselves, but not in ourselves alone. I do not claim to know all the ways of Providence, yet you can trust in me, placing your confidence in the loving George W.

May God continue to bless the United States of America.

Thank you.

Anti-drug commercials mislead public

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

The blockbuster and surreal atmosphere of the Super Bowl tends to extend beyond the playing field. Companies that make the $2 million investment for a 30 second commercial are sure to deliver their most sharpened and entertaining marketing skills. This makes even the breaks between the action worthwhile television viewing.

FedEx spent several million in a hilarious spoof on the movie "Castaway," where a Tom Hanks look-alike answered the question that was left in everyone's mind at the end of the movie—What was in that FedEx box?—which, of course, conveniently possessed the resources most useful for survival when on a stranded island. Pepsi also spent millions in an entertaining line that featured celebs du jour—the Osbourne family, with a famous television family of the past, the Osmonds. Budweiser spent close to $20 million in great fashion, featuring more animals partaking in gridiron battle—this time with zebras, appropriately, as referees. Upcoming movies were pitched as well—"Terminator 3" and "The Matrix 2" were both involved in the high-priced showcase action.

Perhaps the only commercials that were deemed both buzzkills and flops were those financed by you and me. Yes, the taxpayers of America spent several million dollars that night in an egregious display of federal government bureaucracy running hog wild. In a fashion becoming all too popular with campaigns seeking to "raise awareness," disingenuous scare tactics were employed in an attempt to defer attention from the actual issue—in this case, deterring people from marijuana use.

In one of the newer commercials, adults are seemingly worried over having another child while waiting for the results of a pregnancy test; it's positive, and then it's revealed that the test was actually for their daughter. One is led to believe that personal sexual irresponsibility was not the culprit for this unexpected pregnancy, but rather the evil sticky green. In another commercial, two obviously stoned guys are stopped in a drive-through fast food spot—clearly experiencing what some have dubbed "the munchies"—when they inadvertently drive over a young girl on a bicycle. This obviously isn't the fault of careless driving, but the reefer they'd previously toked. A bumper sticker comes to mind, "Drunk Drivers Kill, Stoned Drivers Miss Their Exit."

Another has two glazed over teenagers sitting in a smoky family den, exchanging silly banter like, "Your sister is hot." Then one takes out a gun, announces it's unloaded and, to prove it, fires at his friend. Surprisingly, we are spared the splattered brains, but the intended message still resonates: smoking pot will kill you.

Other commercials seek to advertise how a marijuana high will lead a susceptible young girl to be raped, and another infers it could motivate a young man to rape a girl. This new line of commercials from the Office of National Drug Control Policy (ONDCP) probably does more harm than good. No teen-agers will ever be dissuaded from experimenting with pot after viewing the commercials, since everyone's experiences with the drug are so laughably at odds with the image the ONDCP is attempting to portray.

The ONDCP, under leadership of Bush nominee John Walters, has chosen an irresponsible route to bolster its cause. Instead of relaying factual information about the effects of marijuana—such as you will experience a mild high, become surmounted to laziness sitting on a couch and in the end your time would have been better spent being productive—they have instead opted for demagogy.

My friend from Ohio told me that while driving back to the University of Dayton this summer, he noticed a sign with a pot leaf that read, "You think it's dry now ... just wait until October. From, Your friends at the DEA." This is another example of a federal agency with too much money on its hands. The DEA, in this instance, could have channeled these funds to help stop the trafficking of dangerous drugs such as heroin, but instead chose to use taxpayer money for its own amusement, and to taunt potheads.

These types of ads would not be in existence if the DEA and the ONDCP were private enterprises. Because such departments are extensions of the government, they understand that they will perpetually be in existence, therefore will continually receive tax dollars regardless of how successful they are (in fact, government agencies tend to be rewarded for failure). If they were private, they couldn't afford to waste resources on billboards that are meaningless and Super Bowl television spots that are fallacious.

Christie Nordhielm, marketing professor at Northwestern University's Kellogg School of Management, found the Super Bowl spots condescending—and she doesn't buy the grim statistics: "If this was an ad for a brand, they would be sued for false advertising," she said.

One commercial I've seen actually accentuates a risk involved with smoking pot that is truthful—two teens are in a bathroom stall at a concert when they are busted for smoking weed, and the narrator then says, "Smoking marijuana gets you arrested." This is an accurate potential consequence for smoking marijuana. Yet why this is the case remains a good cause for debate.

Charity essential to ideal economic system

By Aaron Hanlon
Senior Writer

Let us reflect on something of great importance—no—of necessity: charity is perhaps one of our most widely overlooked virtues. So often we are force-fed two extremes in the classroom: ruthless, cold-blooded pseudo-capitalism that has been reduced to oversimplified dynamics of competition and exemplified by Enron and sweatshops, and the oft-celebrated social welfare state, known for high taxes, government handouts and a general disregard for individual freedom. Implicit in true capitalism, charity is the key to finding optimal middle ground between the two highly unfavorable extremes.

For all of the Adam Smith that we read (not nearly enough to begin with), we are rarely introduced to Smith's other important work. "The Theory of Moral Sentiments" is a discussion of, as Smith wrote, the principles of human nature "which interest him in the fortune of others, and render their happiness necessary to him." In this work, Smith argues that an essential component of human happiness is the self-serving act of charity. Indeed, charity is self-serving as one "derives nothing from it except the pleasure of seeing it," though charity undeniably has auspicious effects on its object as well. Amid all the critiques of capitalism and man's self-serving nature, charity is continually excluded from discussion. This is extremely unfortunate, as Smith has been right all along: charity is essential for the proper functioning of a capitalist society.

While pecuniary emulation may give us added incentive to drop much of our expendable income on, say, car audio and Louis Vuitton, and simple convenience may lead us to eat out a few nights per week instead of knocking off one more meal credit (sunk cost) at the cafeteria, it does not take much to give something to someone who has nothing. There will always be people living in poverty who are one set of Tiffany earrings away from a month's worth of meals. And while we are stocking up on granola bars and Diet Coke at the truckload sale at the end of each semester, plenty of people within miles of this campus are walking around without shoes.

I am not trying to preach. I am as "guilty" as anyone of imprudent expenditure—and I do not feel the slightest bit guilty about it. Neither should you. Everyone has the right to what they earn, and no one has the right to impose limits of what is "enough" on someone else. If you like to buy nice things or your parents like to buy nice things for you, it does not make you a bad person. One of the many virtues of capitalism is that no one has an entitlement to take from you what you earn. Likewise, you can spend or save your earnings at your own discretion. It is among the most basic of your human rights.

Charity is yet another key virtue that makes capitalism function as the ideal economic system. It gives us a sense of fulfillment. The act of helping out another of less fortunate circumstance is the ultimate manifestation of humanity. It is what separates us (among other things, of course) from animals that roam the Earth with the sole purpose of survival. As a human race, we are fortunate enough to feel self-gratifying compassion. We do not need the government to force us to pay unreasonable amounts of taxes according to our income and redistribute our wealth for us. We do not need our government to echo the "from each according to his means, to each according to his need" sentiments of Marxism. We do not need a "living wage." We have an intrinsic human awareness that says "take what you earn, but leave no one behind." Ultimately, the laws of nature will never allow us to truly leave no one behind; but we ought to listen more carefully to the voice of compassion when it calls.

I am not asking you to start making your own clothing and renounce consumerism. I am not even asking you not to buy that Burberry scarf, that extra pair of shoes or that third or fourth pair of shoes for that matter. Just bear in mind how far the slightest bit of your help can go in the world of someone who has not even the basic necessities of life. If you have not already, I urge you to give something to someone who needs it. You might be pleasantly surprised when what you thought would be a sacrifice turns out to be far more rewarding than what you might have purchased in its place. Though it sounds trite in words, the experience of giving proves its own satisfaction. It takes merely one gift of kindness to realize that charity is invaluable.

Global economy faced with many challenges

By Mike Niebauer
Senior Writer

World economic and political globalization has produced curious and critical geographic developments. First, countries with regional trade and political relationships have formed into economic trade entities. The most influential of these are the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) and the European Union (EU). Both of these organizations are working toward including countries within their membership that are economically dependent with low-wage work forces. New European members such as Poland will play this role, as has Mexico under the NAFTA accord. These low-wage dependent populations will do the less desirable work for competitive reasons for the economic members.

Second, governments under these agreements work to keep trade and labor regulation minimal and wages low in exchange for opening their markets to their membership's goods and the global market competition.

Third, both of these trade organizations and world markets are currently under pressure from the global natural resource (oil) sector. Venezuelan electoral and economic politics are destabilizing the economies of NAFTA's members, while the EU's members struggle to grow their economies as global oil prices spike over $30 per barrel. It may be open to question whether these international trading blocks are as stable as believed or advertised when it comes to natural resources.

In her book "World On Fire," Yale Professor Amy Chua cites this as a "paradox of globalization and U.S. foreign policy: the combination of 'laissez-faire' capitalism and free elections can create political and economic instability." Hugo Chavez was elected in a landslide victory in 1998 and constitutionally reaffirmed in 2000. Many of Chavez's problems are admittedly self-induced, but the conditions currently troubling Venezuela are orchestrated by his political and economic adversaries.

Chavez has responded by threatening to nationalize the important Venezuelan oil company that owns Citgo gas stations in the United States. His opposition, the business elite that has run Venezuela and its oil companies for decades, is locking out workers in the oil business to force an unscheduled and unconstitutional electoral result in their favor. Chavez has moved to get oil production moving once again by using the military.

The dispute is also ethnic. Chavez is a "pardo," one of Amerindian and African ancestry, while traditional ruling elite is a small minority of "mantuanos," or Europeans, with a pervasive attitude of ownership and entitlement. This group has the most experience with foreign investors. This reality is being reproduced in many emerging national economies in the world. Small minorities of the privileged are being challenged by long repressed majority ethnic groups in all political and economic areas. Chua correctly points out that the U.S. agenda of promoting democracies around the world may be deepening instability in many regions of the world as natural resources become more scarce.

The outcome of this instability and the economic troubles in Argentina and ongoing Colombian strife has put U.S. President George W. Bush's dream of a hemisphere enveloping free trade agreement for the Americas on hold. Venezuela's problems are our problems in the now global economy. Bush Senior pushed for NAFTA in a very different economic environment. It will be more of a challenge to adequately sustain and implement the NAFTA and European economic accords than anyone could have originally imagined. This will be true in the Americas and in the EU as natural resources become the economic "wild card" that effect all countries and their relationships in all areas.

Nicaragua and Bucknell need Brigade

By Josh Fisher
Opinions Editor

Every January and March Bucknell Brigade delegates bring medical supplies and funds to Nueva Vida, Nicaragua. Having been a Brigadista twice now, I know that I can do no justice to the experience. And I can only intimate how Nicaragua has been put in its current position it is in, and how desperately the nation needs the help that the Bucknell Brigade attempts to provide.

After a half-century of dictatorships, civil war and natural disasters, Nicaragua is now like a pond across which a terrible storm had once swept. The energy for democracy and self-determination have now been transformed into desperation.

Back in 1984, there was a ray of hope on the horizon as Daniel Ortega, the leader of the Sandanista revolution, overthrew the brutal 43-year Somoza dictatorship, which had siphoned away disaster funds meant for the impoverished victims of the 1972 earthquake. A new era of Nicaraguan democratic rule had been issued in, and hundreds of thousands celebrated in the capital of Managua. Ideological freedom and national self-determination was soon to follow.

But in former President Ronald Reagan's America there was no quarrel too remote, no conflict too petty so long as it rang with the echoes of anti-Communism.

And so America's role in this impoverished country was brought into sharp focus. With CIA machinators running around machinating, the United States was fishing in troubled waters. Reagan, so nostalgic for the Somoza days, illegally funded counter-revolutionary "terrorists" known as the Contras, to forcibly return Nicaragua to the dictatorship.

The cost? Sixty thousand Nicaraguan lives, the country's infrastructure and economy and $178 billion. The United States was a little more than "implicated" in the whole affair.

In the list of political monsters, Reagan belongs up there with the others—Anastasio and Luis Somoza, Augusto Pinochet, Henry Kissinger, Richard Nixon and Saddam Hussein. The World Court even condemned the United States for its role in the Iran-Contra Affair, but consistent with our narrowly defined worldview, the United States does not recognize the World Court.

So much for the American century. A great ideological power, come and gone. As the German philosopher, Friedrich Nietzsche believed, "He who fights with monsters might take care lest he thereby become a monster. And if you gaze for long into an abyss, the abyss gazes also into you."

Appropriately, President George W. Bush's State of the Union speech this week marked a complete reversion to these wreckless, shady, Reaganesque politics and the continuing decline of American democracy.

But beyond these reductionist theories of politics and power, the melodramas of authority stories, the twists and turnings of unfinished stories, Nicaragua's forests, volcanos and villages are somehow colored with the Nicaraguan experience—and yet everywhere the diffracted presence of the United States. Modern day imperialism.

The Americans, nothing if not self-righteous, urged and continue to urge radical Reaganomics—deregulations, the market, reduction of public expenditures, tax breaks, friendliness toward foreign investments (or foreign exploitation, for that matter), International Monetary Fund structural adjustments and an American strength of character—on the Nicaraguans.

Bus stations are sponsored by Coca-Cola. Nike and Levi's sweatshops control the labor market. When there was still nearly 80 percent unemployment in Nueva Vida alone, the U.S. Ambassador to Nicaragua campaigned against the socialist Sandinista party and Daniel Ortega in the 2001 election, while ironically seeking "a free, fair and democratic election"—rolling over democracy in a democratic country, flexing muscles over the poorest of countries, the American hand is still all but concealed in the affairs of the Nicaraguan people.

What works for Americans—capitalism, market forces—may not work for Nicaraguans. In reparations for our crimes against the country, the United States should not be telling the Nicaraguans what they need, but asking them what they need, as the Bucknell Brigade has done.

But perhaps the first step would be to not interfere with Nicaraguan elections and self-determination—if they make a mistake, then let it be their own mistake.

There is no description for this revelation, the importance of the Brigade, but indeed it has defined who I am. There is one thing I can say: Sometimes it is not until you are where you least expect that you understand where you were. Maybe it is better said by Arthur Schopenhaur: "Everyone takes the limits of his own vision for the limits of the world."

Campus comments on the State of the Union

"It wasn't surprising that Bush used a large section of his speech to highlight his plans for the economy. Even if he does desire the new tax cuts to boost the economy, there's no reason why these tax cuts will succeed when the previous, massive cuts failed. Combine these cuts with Bush's impending war on Iraq and the increases he proposes in spending, and the speech becomes apparent as something of a recipe for Reaganesque deficit spending. In the end, the speech resembled a typical political campaign: full of promises and platitudes, but much in need of a dose of reality."
—Denis Kennedy '05

"I think the state of the country is poised for an upswing. The war and President Bush's tax cut package will provide some needed economic stimulus. Bush's speech could have been easier on the war rhetoric and more focused on economic policy, but that's what his administration is focusing on."
—Kevin Lang '04

"The numbers just don't add up. How can we fight a war while 28 states are in deficit, our federal government is projected to be $199 bilion in deft, while at the same time President Bush wants a $680 billion tax cut on top of the $1.35 trillion tax cut passed last year."
—Jason Kim '04

"My first reaction is that he [President Bush] came as close to declaring war as he could without saying those actual words. He spoke with a strong voice and there weren't as many malapropisms as normally expected. I'm interested in seeing how his domestic plans will actually work out. I don't think the $1.2 billion for hydrogen cars will happen once the special interests get involved."
—Greg Yankee '05

"The best way to sum up President Bush's speech was the way Juan Williams, a liberal, did on Fox News Channel: "He sounded like a real person up there." He talked about what Americans really care about and are nervous about right now: helping the economy and protecting America. Yeah, he screws up his words sometimes, but people can see that his heart is really in the right place. He stated very clearly that Saddam Hussein has failed to account for weapons that the U.N. knows he had, that he has the ability and the malice to cause the death of thousands of Americans and that he must and will be disarmed, even if we can't get our moral superiors in France to go along with it."

Military draft bill introduced in Congress

By Michael Dudzinski
Staff Writer

Adamant that U.S. President George W. Bush live up to his role as the voice of the people, Sen. Ernest Hollings, D-S.C., urged Monday that the military draft be reinstated. Outrightly opposed by the Pentagon, the Associated Press reported that the move would be the first since the 1968 draft for the Vietnam War.

Introduced this month in the House of Representatives and Senate, the bill requires all enlisted men and women to serve two full years in the armed forces. With the exemption of high school students and disabled citizens, the military would reserve the right to call up all others aged 18-26.

A joint letter was submitted to Congress this week, stressing the concerns of Hollings and Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y.

"If we are preparing for war against an enemy who wishes to 'threaten our society,' as Bush says, then it makes sense that all who benefit from our society must share in defending it," said the letter, according to the Associated Press.

Rangel raised eyebrows by suggesting Monday that Bush is all too eager for war with Iraq, an objective with which most Americans are discontent. CNN reported Rangel's concern that "Congress needs to take a good look at this war before we get involved in it."

"If we do get involved...let all of America say we're sharing the sacrifice," Rangel said, according to CNN.

Both lawmakers maintained that a draft would allow the American people to think twice about the repercussions of a U.S.-led war against Iraq. According to CNN, mandatory enlistment would present the Bush administration with a clear message that Americans oppose the use of force in Iraq. CNN reported that deploying young adults to fight for an ambiguous cause would not likely serve as a justification for American parents.

Advocating that the proposed bill not be taken lightly, Hollings supports it as an effective means to avert the immediacy of war.

"One way to avoid a lot more wars is to institute the draft... causing the country to sober up, and its leadership too," Hollings said, according to CNN.

Hollings also expressed concern that the country is not economically fit to fund a war with minimal international support. Rangel added that a war would expand the growing deficit, leaving U.S. taxpayers to pay the tab in the coming years.

Noting that Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld would not authorize the reinstatement of the draft, aides to both representatives implied that the proposed bill has no intention of becoming law. Rather, reported The New York Times, it serves as an indicator that all concerns must be weighed before legitimate force can be justified.

During World War II and Vietnam, many young men avoided enlistment through temporary leaves of absence from the United States. The New York Times said that the violent protests during the height of Vietnam eventually called for the replacement of the draft with an all-volunteer military.

The Department of Selective Services confirmed last fall that 14.1 million Americans were eligible if the draft were be reinstated.

The next step in the Iraqi conflict?

In Iraq, U.N. weapons inspectors make their way toward the al-Qaim phosphate plant, about 250 miles away from Baghdad. Even though inspections have not proven that Iraq has revived its nuclear weapons program, the United Nations still believes Iraq has concealed weapons.

By Lindsey Gentel
Staff Writer

Two months of weapons inspections in Iraq have not proven that Baghdad has attempted to revive its nuclear arms program, Hans Blix, the head of the U.N. weapons inspectors, said Monday.

Giving a broadly negative report on Iraq's cooperation with two months of inspections, he provided support to the Bush administration's campaign to disarm Iraq with necessary force.

"Iraq appears not to have come to genuine acceptance—not even today—of the disarmament which was demanded of it and which it needs to carry out to win the confidence of the world and live in peace," Blix said, according to The New York Times.

The White House is likely to declassify some intelligence information about Iraq's effort to obtain and conceal weapons of mass destruction. This evidence is likely to be disclosed next week after the State of the Union Address.

"Time is running out. We've made it very clear from the very beginning that we would not allow the process of inspections to string out forever," Secretary of State Colin L. Powell said, according to CNN.com.

Mohamed ElBaradei, chief of the international Atomic Energy Agency, was much less confrontational with Iraq, calling the inspection process a valuable investment in the interest of peace. In an oblique jab at the United States' impatience with the inspection process and continued threats of war against Baghdad, ElBaradei requested the Security Council grant him a "few months" more to complete his work.

"Barring exceptional circumstances and provided there is sustained cooperation by Iraq, we should be able within the next few months to provide credible assurance that Iraq has no nuclear weapons program," ElBaradei said, according to MSNBC.com.

He said Iraq must be more forthcoming with information about its pre-1991 nuclear arms program and a number of other unresolved issues if it wants to prove its innocence to an increasingly impatient international community.

Since Blix and ElBaradei's briefings, the 15-member Security Council has come to an ultimate divergence about the start of the inspections. The U.S. ambassador, John Negroponte, said that Iraq's actions demonstrated that it had no intention of unveiling its secret arms to the inspectors and inspections had already gone on long enough.

"There is nothing in either presentation that would give us hope that Iraq has ever intended to fully comply," Negroponte said, according to The New York Times.

France, Russia, China and other veto-bearing Council countries insisted that the inspections are still working and should be allowed to continue.

A German proposal consisted of having the inspectors report back to the Council again on Feb. 14. Such a date for a further interim report would demonstrate to unconvinced allies, such as France, that they are not rushing to judgment. The postponement would also allow the United States and Britain, the United States' closest ally, to continue preparations for a war in late February or March.

Most of the Security Council nations supported the German proposal on Monday. The United States accepted it, but said no significance should be attached to the date.

Powell takes a strong stand against Saddam Hussein

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

As the gears of war continue to turn and the world listens to the United States rattle its sabers against the regime in Iraq, the Bush administration is losing one of its biggest anti-war members in Secretary of State Colin Powell. Well-known for his opposition to many of the military conflicts in the last two decades, Powell is coming out strongly against Iraqi President Saddam Hussein and leading many to believe that the United States is serious about going to war.

Last week, during meetings with the French over their reluctance to approve an American confrontation in Iraq, Powell snapped from his anti-war stance.

According to Newsweek, "As Powell listened to Europeans boast about the success of the weapons inspectors in Iraq, his patience finally gave out. Sitting across a long rectangular table inside Manhattan's Waldorf-Astoria hotel, the usually genial Powell issued a stark warning to his French counterpart: the clock has run out on Saddam and the United Nations. 'Don't underestimate the resolve of the United States to solve this problem without dragging it out,' he said. The dove had finally morphed into a hawk."

The Newsweek report said why Powell is getting more outspoken.

One senior State Department official said Powell's change of heart is a gradual awakening. "People ask why Powell is becoming increasingly hard-line. It's because every day, when we wake up in the morning, the facts are clear that Iraq has gone back to its old ways and is refusing to disarm, and trying to prevent the inspectors from disarming them. It's a big decision, especially for a former general who knows what this is all about," the official said.

The biggest instance of his new outspoken nature on the Iraq situation came last weekend at the World Economic Forum held in Davos, Switzerland. The forum regularly attracts high-profile business and political figures from around the world to talk about the world economy, the state of international affairs and to enjoy a little respite in the Alps.

According to an earlier report in Newsweek, "the U.S. Secretary of State drew a capacity audience to his address at a gathering characterized by international criticism of the United States and on the eve of the United Nations weapons inspectors' much-anticipated Jan. 27 report on Iraq. Delegates spilled out from the main auditorium of the town's conference center into hallways, where crowds stood three deep to watch the address by video link."

Secretary of State Colin Powell has changed his anti-war stance, causing many Americans to believe the United States will soon be going to war against Iraq.

The speech, despite its tough rhetoric and, according to The New York Times, "muscular, unapologetic and at times emotional defense of the nation's exercise of power," did appeal to the audience as a whole. Powell is generally seen around the world as a trusted source of information and a comforting member of the Bush administration.

Powell received four standing ovations during the speech and found an unusual consensus among the attendees of the forum. Newsweek reported a wide approval for Powell's speech.

"America couldn't have asked for a more elegant and eloquent spokesman," a risk analyst whose company operates in several countries outside the United States said in an interview given to Newsweek.

"It was very thoughtful and thought provoking," a British-based executive for a major investment company said to Newsweek. "It was well put together and embellished on a lot of hot-button issues."

Newsweek also reported that Powell went a long way toward comforting much of the world about the issue of war in Iraq. He also seemed to win some sympathy with his brief historical overview of American attempts to help other nations after World War II and countries ranging from Kuwait to Afghanistan.

"We seek nothing for ourselves, other than to help bring about security for others who have suffered so much," he said.

The following day, Powell was back in the United States responding to the release of the U.N. weapons inspectors' report to the Security Council. Powell resoundingly denounced the report that followed several weeks of inspections in Iraq. The New York Times reported Powell's impact in his response.

"By promising to study the report and consult with other members of the Security Council before acting, the secretary made a modest concession to the qualms of Europeans about what many here describe as Washington's stampede toward war," according to The New York Times. "But he also recited a litany of failures and unanswered questions in Iraq's cooperation with the inspectors, who have been looking for biological, chemical and nuclear weapons in Iraq for two months."

Powell did come out very strongly in his comments about Iraq's attempts to cooperate with the United Nations and its inspectors.

According to The New York Times, Powell said, "Let's not forget the vital part of the resolution that comes toward the end: There would be serious consequences for continued Iraqi violation of its obligation. Those serious consequences are the lever that was needed to get the inspectors in, to get the inspectors to be able to do their work, which was to assist Iraq in disarmament. Iraqi intransigence brings us to a situation where we see that regime's continuing to confront the fundamental choice between compliance with 1441 and the consequences and to come clean. And the answer is not much more time. Iraq's time for choosing peaceful disarmament is fast coming to an end."

Powell finished his statements with his most withering assessment.

"As I've watched the process unfold, I have watched Iraq go by every diplomatic exit ramp that was put there for them. They could have made a full, complete and accurate declaration in December, which would have given us some confidence that they were serious about disarmament. Instead, they gave us 12,200 pages of nothing very useful," Powell said.

Many watchers of U.S. foreign policy read a strengthening of the American resolve to go to war in Iraq. They point to the new public support for the war from Powell. His approval of a conflict there may turn the Bush White House more strongly toward a possible Persian Gulf War II.

KOREA

North Korea did not reactivate its nuclear facilities until Dec. 12, a month after the oil freeze. It followed that action by asking the United Nations to remove monitoring equipment from its nuclear facilities and withdrawing entirely from the Nonproliferation Treaty. North Korean representatives have maintained that the only facilities that have been or are planned to be reactivated are power plants necessary to compensate for the loss of oil and that recent rocket tests have been part of its space program.

According to The New York Times, North Korea has maintained that it will only negotiate on nuclear weapons with the United States, even after it issued a "heavily qualified" statement to South Korea that it would not develop nuclear weapons.

Since the crisis began, North Korea has consistently directed most statements about its possible weapons program towards the United States, while claiming harmlessness to the international community, according to CNN.com. When it pulled out of the treaty, the North Korean government claimed that its nuclear research would be limited to "peaceful purposes."

Since this declaration, North Korea has said that other countries "do not need to poke their nose into" its weapons program, and that "if our enemies keep talking about a missile threat, this can only bring about harm to them."

"Our socialist motherland is sure to win a conflict against the United States," Kim Jong Il said on Jan. 23, according to CNN.com.

The size of North Korea's standing military is estimated at one million people, which would make it the fifth largest in the world.

Men's basketball reaches .500 mark

With the victory over Lafayette the team improves its record to 9-9 and 3-2 in the Patriot League

The Bucknell men's basketball team improved its overall record to 9-9 and its Patriot League record to a respectable 3-2 with a 68-48 victory at Sojka Pavilion over Lafayette on Jan. 26th.

Bucknell dominated the glass, out-rebounding the Leopards 44-21. Boakai Lalugba '03 snatched 15 of them, while scoring a game-high 23 points. Roland Webber '04 reflected on Lalugba's performance and knows that the team needs and expects performances such as this one more often down the road.

"That's [Lalugba's dominance] what we are going to need to succeed in the league," Webber said. "He was a true man on the boards. We are used to seeing that out of him. He is that kind of player. Fifteen boards for him is equivalent to seven or eight to most big men in our league."

It was the Bison defense that set the tone, holding Lafayette to 39 percent shooting. Lafayette's Justin DeBerry, the Patriot League's leading scorer entering the contest, was held at bay with just four points on 2-12 shooting. With the exception of the Leopards grabbing an early 2-0 advantage, Bucknell never trailed in the game. Matthew Quinn '04 sparked a Bison 10-3 run with five quick points and the Orange and Blue never looked back. Quinn felt as if he needed to step up his productivity, given the fact that Chris Rodgers '04 was not playing.

"I realized that we had less depth in the backcourt entering the game than we had been accustomed to throughout the season," Quinn said. "However, it wasn't only that fact that motivated me to produce in the early stages of the game. I was also driven by the fact that I played well the game before against Army and I wanted to continue to prove to myself, the guys and the coaches that I could start being a key contributor on a consistent basis."

Bucknell led by as many as eight points, 29-21, in the first half when Kevin Bettencourt '06, who played with the flu, buried a three-pointer with 1 minute, 8 seconds remaining. The Herd clung to a 29-24 lead at the intermission. Head Coach Pat Flannery was pleased with the team's ability to not only preserve its halftime lead, but also stretch it out.

"I think that we started out the second half with a lot of momentum coming out of the locker room," Flannery said. "I think we were able to use our bench and it helped us soften them [Lafayette] up a little bit. We were able to physically keep guys on the floor. We had people making shots and they had to go man-to-man."

Davorin Skornik '04 finished a crucial lay up while being fouled with the Bison leading 35-30 early in the second half, which kick-started a Bucknell 17-6 run over an eight minute span. The team led by as many as 24 points at 66-42, thanks to

Women's swimming tries for a perfect season

By Stephen Schwanhausser
Staff Writer

After recent success, the women's swimming and diving team had a reprieve from competition as it prepared for the end of the season. This final month of competition includes two home meets, one against rival Lehigh on Saturday, followed by the Patriot League Championships, held from Feb. 20-22.

This is the most essential part of the season, as the team begins to rest, shave and look toward the fulfillment of year-long goals.

Co-captain Becky Dolan '03 is excited about it.

"Two of our three team goals for the season were to have an undefeated duel meet season and to win Patriots. Both those goals are finally within reach and I am very excited to be part of a team that can finish the way I have always dreamed," Dolan said.

The defeat of Lehigh would in fact make this first goal a reality, as the team has not lost to a Patriot League rival all season. At this point last year, the Bison were able to defeat the Lehigh Mountain Hawks 159-139, and with the addition of a strong first-year class, and the loss of only two seniors, this year's outcome is definitely in Bucknell's favor.

In last year's competition, Lehigh's top competitor was senior Lauren Ayres, who won the 1,000-meter free, the 500 free and the 200 fly. With her

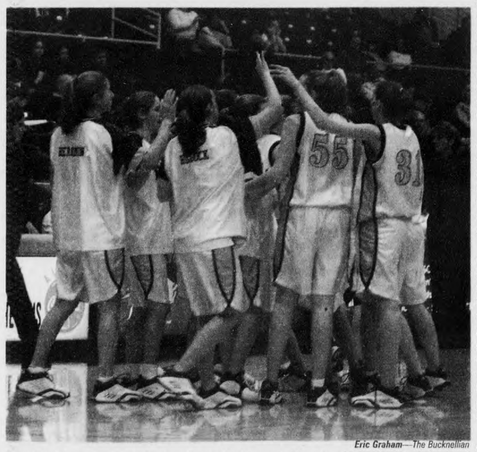
The Lady Bison extend a three game Patriot League winning streak

With a 72-62 victory over Army the women's team improves its Patriot league record to 3-2 and 8-9 overall

By Joe Schweitzer
Staff Writer

The Bucknell women's basketball team throttled Army 72-62 on Jan. 24, sending a message that the Patriot League champs are back. Lafayette received the memo too late as the Bison onslaught victimized the Leopards 87-73 just two days later. The Lady Bison showed their superiority by winning their second and third straight Patriot League battles, improving to 3-2 and 8-9 overall.



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

The Lady Bison regroup and get ready to take the court. The trio of Desire Almind '04, Molly Creamer '03 and Kate Franks '03 combined to shoot 25-of-42 from the field and score 70 of Bucknell's 87 points.

Bucknell opened the game with an 8-1 lead behind senior Molly Creamer's sharp shooting. Army fought back within one, 13-12, but woke up the defending Patriot League champions in the process. Bucknell erupted into a 10-0 run behind six points from Kate Franks '03 to take a 23-12 advantage midway through the first half. The team looked destined for their first victory at Sojka Pavilion with a commanding 37-22 halftime lead behind Creamer's 11 points.

"We knew coming into the game that Army is a tough team and wasn't going to be intimidated by us," Patriot League Player of the Year Creamer said. "That helped us focus and get back to playing our style of basketball."

The Orange and Blue kept their lead in double digits for the 10 minutes of the second stanza. Army refused to believe in the strength of the champs as All-Patriot League star Katie Macfarlane sparked an Army attack that scored 11 points in just two minutes, closing the gap to six, 50-44. Creamer then scored 12 straight points to ignite the Bison attack as they rediscovered their killer instinct down the stretch by making 9 out of 12 free throws to finish off the Black Knights.

Creamer's 32 points led the Orange and Blue to victory and herself into the record books on Friday night. She scored her 11th point on a backdoor pass from Lindsey Geosits '06 with 5 minutes left in the first half, eclipsing a 14-year-old career scoring mark previously held by Jen Walz.

"I thought we came out focused from the very beginning," Head Coach Kathy Fedorjaka said. "The score isn't always the best indicator of how a team is playing during a game. Sometimes we can be up by six and I am upset with our play, and other times I feel good about our performance and the scoreboard shows us trailing. I never felt worried—even when Army fought back into the game—because I knew we were focused and playing good basketball. Obviously, the final score shows that."

The Orange and Blue champions dismantled Lafayette 87-73 on Jan. 26 to continue their impressive weekend onslaught at Sojka Pavilion. The 8-9 Bison moved a step closer to .500 overall and improved to 3-2 in league play with their third straight Patriot League win.

The teams traded early baskets before the Leopards mounted a 12-4 run, including five from Lafayette standout Colleen Fitzpatrick, giving Lafayette a 32-24 advantage with under six minutes remaining in the half. Bucknell nibbled away at the lead and pulled through even when Chelsea Smith '06 was fouled while fighting for a rebound. She converted both free throws, ending the first half tied at 42.

"I really wasn't happy with our defensive intensity in the first half," Fedorjaka said. "I felt we only really had six good defensive possessions and I challenged the team to pick up their defensive intensity in the second half."

As defending Patriot League champions, it was fitting that the Bucknell defense restored the team's championship swagger in the second half. The Lady Bison suffocated Lafayette with a swarming full court press that provided the fuel to launch an attack. Creamer stole the ball

Bison track dominates the herd at Bucknell Octagon

Bucknell records five early season IC4A/ECAC qualifying marks at the Penn State Invitational this past weekend

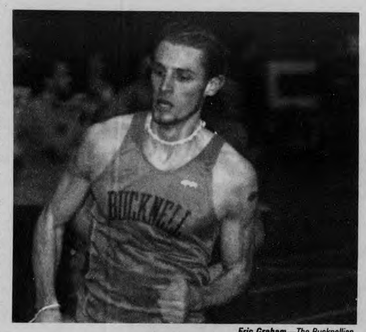
By Evan Honeyfield
Staff Writer

Bucknell men's and women's track teams dominated the competition at the Bucknell Octagonal this past Saturday, highlighted by a NCAA provisional long jump by Noel Powell '03.

Powell's jump of 25 feet provisionally qualified him for the national championship meet and broke his own school record by over two inches. Powell needs to jump another nine inches to get an automatic bid, which may happen soon. On an attempt that was ruled a foul, he jumped an impressive 25-7. Powell also proved himself on the track by winning the 200-meter dash and placing 3rd in the 55-meter dash.

The men used 18 top-three finishes to score 187 points and put away St. Francis (120.5 points) and Rider (56 points). Darrell Perry '03 used a fierce lean at the line to win the 55 hurdles by 0.01 seconds, while Rich Alexander '03 was 4th, a mere 0.016 seconds back. Eric Furst '03 won the 800-meter run with sit and kick tactics, while Lou Palma '03 led the final 600 meters of the 1,000-meter run after a slow opening. Bryan Johnston '03 led the mile nearly wire-to-wire and then came back later in the day to win the 3000-meter run. Jeff Arek '04 won the pole vault and then Palma, Furst, Koran Evans '06 and Matias Palavecino '03 won the 4x800-meter relay, putting the Bison out of reach in the team standings.

Head Coach Kevin Donner said he was not only happy with the wins, but also some of the personal bests that were put forth.



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Bryan Johnston '03 maintains the lead in his frontrunning mile victory during the Bucknell Octagonal. The effort was one of two first-place finishes for Johnston, who later won the 3,000-meter.

"Sean McCarthy had a huge personal best in the mile with his 4:22 to place 4th. Nick Mousetis ran a great race in the 5,000 to place 2nd and Brian Klotz seems to be making a great comeback after struggling with injuries last year and placed 3rd in the 400," Donner said.

"The team as a whole is looking very strong," Powell said. "I think we are better this year than previous years. We need to work on supporting everyone on the team. I don't think some people realize just how much it helps the team when everyone is cheering you on and getting you pumped up for the event. There are a lot of individual events in track, but this helps the team as a whole."

The Lady Bison also benefited from a balanced team effort, scoring in 17 of 18 events. Their 157.5 points easily defeated their closest competition, Temple (102 points) and Dusquesne (96.5 points). Katie Pfeifer '05 turned in one of the most exciting performances with a come-from-behind win in the 5,000-meter run. The 2nd place finisher from Towson moved into lane three while approaching a lapped runner near the finish, allowing Pfeifer to slip inside for the win. Amy Calvo '05, one week off of setting her school record in the 500, used her speed to win the 800 in the homestretch. Nikki Piper '03, who won the 500, teamed up with Calvo, Charity Brady '03 and Monique Boley '05 to win a close 4x400-meter relay. In the field, Angie McFarland '05 threw a personal best of 48-3 to lead a 20 point effort from the 20-pound weight throw.

"Tolu Fayanjuola's points in some top heavy events [long and high jumps] really solidify our women's team," Donner said.

"Since the sprints, throws, jumps and hurdles were pretty stacked at this meet, we knew to win the meet that we needed to dominate in the middle distance, which we did. Our long distance crew is young and with a couple key injuries we are not as deep as we expect to be," Donner said. "They still did a great job scoring some points, however. I was very impressed with our sprints, hurdles, jumps and throws, who all came to compete and were pivotal in winning the meet on both sides."

Assistant Coach Mario Wilson said the meet was very comparable to a league meet in terms of overall competition in each event.

"I believe we are doing everything that we can do to prepare for [Patriot Leagues], and when the time comes we will be ready to bring home another league title," McFarland said.

This weekend will split the team between the Penn State National Invitational and Bucknell's Bison Open, with both meets starting Friday evening and concluding Saturday.

"This weekend we will focus on individual performances. It is important to get in the faster sections at the league meet as well as the good lanes," Donner said.

Bucknell's track teams took advantage of the competition and facility at Penn State this past Saturday to record five early season IC4A/ECAC qualifying marks while placing 6th out of 11 on the women's side and 7th of 11 on the men's. Penn State and Cornell dominated both meets, taking first and second places, respectively, for men and women.

The Bison had a number of men show that they are becoming big time meet performers. Lou Palma '03 took 3rd in an exciting mile that came down to the last 50 meters, Bryan Johnston '03 used a strong finishing kick to take 3rd in the 3,000-meter run, and Eric Furst '03 chased Matt Lincoln from Penn State to 2nd place in the 1,000-meter run. Joining Johnston and Furst as IC4A qualifiers were Noel Powell's pair of 4th place finishes in the 200-meter dash and long jump and the 4x800-meter relay team of Furst, Palma, Matias Palavecino '03, and Thomas Prochilo '04.

Head Coach Kevin Donner was particularly happy with the number of men who made big improvements.

"I was also very pleased with Matias Palavecino in the 1,000m and our two hurdlers making the Championship final," Donner said.

Furst said he was also impressed with Palavecino, John Trotta '06 and Kevin Walsh '04 in the distance medley relay.

"As always, Noel was one of the best athletes on the track, and the hurdlers [Rich Alexander '03 and Darrell Perry '03] showed promise by advancing to the finals. So if we can develop those aspects of our team, we will be in good shape for leagues."

Amy Calvo '05 was the sole ECAC qualifier for the Lady Bison in her 500-meter run school record, but the women did have a number of other close calls. Nikki

What's so wrong with a rout?

At about this time last year, I was composing a column that highlighted the most heart-pounding, tight-to-the-wire Super Bowls in history, a compilation and comparison that seemed appropriate after the New England Patriots had just sealed a thriller against the St. Louis Rams. A game like that usually generates a few nominations for ownership of the title "The Greatest Super Bowl Ever." There was, of course, no such buzz this year, after the Tampa Bay Buccaneers utterly thumped the Oakland Raiders last Sunday evening.

In fact, the prevalent attitude among football enthusiasts seems to be that this game was satisfactory at best. Not enough suspense. Complete lethargy from one side of the field. Very little nail-biting.

Most people have already filed the game into a historical category designated expressly for the placement of games that an individual could not possibly have enjoyed unless under one or any combination of the following circumstances: he or she 1) is a fan of the winning team; 2) had placed a "friendly wager" benefiting from the outcome; or 3) chose to imbibe a significant portion of special game day beverages.

The Bucs' romp will join a host of other routs and embarrassments in this category. For whatever they're worth, here are a few of the Big Game's most uneven installments.

Super Bowl I, Green Bay Packers 35, Kansas City Chiefs 10: It wasn't yet referred to as the Super Bowl, and that's all for the better, because it wasn't exactly super. Bart Starr was. Max McGee was. The whole Packers' team was. The Chiefs, however, were not. The second half saw the Packers blank the Chiefs 21-0 en route to an anticlimactic championship.

Super Bowl XVIII, Los Angeles Raiders 38, Washington Redskins 9: The silver and black of 25 years ago outdid the Packers' Super Bowl I effort by scoring 38 points and distancing the Redskins by a 29-point expanse. Running back Marcus Allen sliced up the defense for 191 yards on 20 carries, earning MVP honors as the Raiders breezed to a relatively uneventful victory.

Super Bowl XX, Chicago Bears 46, New England Patriots 10: This was the game that transcended the term "rout" and established the tradition of absolute blowouts in the Super Bowl. It was so lopsided that the Bears eventually stopped playing football and started simply toying with their painfully outmatched rival. The Patriots allowed seven sacks and managed only to squeak out a paltry seven rushing yards. The New Englanders would have no choice but to shuffle away in shame, while the Bears eventually shuffled on into the realm of pop culture history.

Super Bowl XXII, Washington Redskins 42, Denver Broncos 10: This one started out a little one-sided as Denver tore through the first quarter with a 10-0 lead. Then things got interesting, with the Redskins coming to life in the second quarter. Then things got boring again, with the Redskins transforming the small comeback into a seemingly endless scoring skein. By halftime, it was a 35-10 game. The befuddled Broncos had apparently burned everything coming out of the gate, and couldn't even throw a speed bump into Washington's path to 42 unanswered points. Better luck next time, Bucky D.

Super Bowl XXIV, San Francisco Forty-Niners 55, Denver Broncos 10: This contest, if it can even be called that, made Super Bowl XX look like an indecipherable photo finish. All that Denver quarterback John Elway had to say before the game was that his Broncos would "show up." When? 1998? They didn't show much of anything against Joe Montana's barnburning 49ers, who outgained Denver 461-167. The good news for the Broncos was that after this performance, nobody remembered Super Bowl XXII anymore.

Super Bowl XXVII, Dallas Cowboys 52, Buffalo Bills 17: The Bills of the early '90s had a remarkable ability to discover and execute new ways to screw up in the Super Bowl every year. This time they coughed up the ball nine times, which the Cowboys converted into 35 of their almost-record 52 points. And it would have been more than "almost" if not for one Buffalo play that single-handedly made up for the game's overall level of sheer dullness. The Cowboys' Leon Lett picked up a fumble, strutted downfield and launched into a pretentious display of celebratory antics as he prepared to tack another seven points onto Dallas' 52-17 lead, when in flew 5-foot-11-inch Buffalo receiver Don Beebe, zeroing in on the ball like a kestrel after a field mouse. The gutty Beebe punched the ball right out of Lett's grip and provided an incredibly satisfying moment for anyone who bothered to stick with the game, long enough to see it happen.

Super Bowl XXIX, San Francisco Forty-Niners 49, San Diego Chargers 26: The Niners didn't have to fight very hard to pin down their record fifth Super Bowl victory. Steve Young slung the ball into the end zone a record six times, with three of those passes landing in the arms of Jerry Rice. The Niners' manhandling of the Chargers contributed to the game's record for total scoring—the two teams managed to throw a combined 75 points on the board.

Super Bowl XXXV, Baltimore Ravens 34, New York Giants 7: The Ravens defense simply devoured the Giants, who had apparently squeezed their offensive potential dry in a 41-0 NFC Championship victory. The beastly Baltimore team forced five turnovers and four sacks, and didn't allow New York to score a single offensive point. The last time Baltimore had won a Super Bowl, they gave the MVP to someone on the losing team. It's a shame they couldn't do that this time around, but instead they gave it to diabolical linebacker Ray Lewis, in a move that temporarily deconstructed all remnants of the world's sense of justice.

Should we now toss Super Bowl XXXVII into the land of no-contests, walkovers and games that never get more intense than the coin toss? After all, the hapless Raiders couldn't even hold the Buccaneers scoreless for the last five seconds of the game, and league MVP Rich Gannon chucked half as many interceptions in one game as he did the entire 2002 regular season. One team made the other look completely inept.

So does one really need to be completely blotted to harbor any real appreciation for this kind of football? Not necessarily. Suspense is overrated; sheer domination can be pretty intoxicating in its own way. Anyway, they can't all be like Super Bowl XXXIV—if they were, we'd probably all die of coronary arrest after about five Super Bowls.

Between the whistles

By now everyone knows about the Bucs defeating the Raiders 48-21 last week in Super Bowl XXXVII.

But while the colossal giants of the gridiron were catching their breath, a phenomenon of equal magnitude to the game itself was occurring, which will continue to be the talk of the office or classroom for many weeks to come. Between the whistles, a corporate commercial bonanza erupted with hard-hitting giants such as Budweiser, Pepsi, Visa and Gatorade all vying for the coveted "Favorite Super Bowl Commercial," a distinction that has gained notoriety since ads have become equally as anticipated as the game, the commercial craze began with the old Bud Bowl's of the early '90s.

I had the privilege of my girlfriend snuggling on my shoulder and 15 hardcore football fans surrounding us in Roberts Lounge. I can think of no better way to enjoy a Sunday evening. And when we weren't poking fun at John Madden, who we nicknamed "Captain Obvious," due to his superficial commentary that gives each and every sports fan an inkling that he or she can be a sports announcer some day, we remained focused on the 27-inch portal to football heaven. When in the past it was commonplace to use commercials as bathroom breaks or opportunities to order Domino's yet again, due to your friend bringing 10 of his closest buds—times have certainly changed and that 1-2 minute break now demands fans' attention. Let's take a look at the good and the bad of commercials aired.

The Good

1) Have you wondered if your employer was watching your every movement during the workday? Reebok took this issue head on and chimed in with its own comical method of increasing office productivity by hiring an "official office linebacker" named Terry Tate. Tackling associates who used the company phone to calling long distance, or employees that did not attach a cover sheet to the "TPS reports" à la "Office Space," Tate was a truly ubiquitous force. The entire lounge busted out in laughter each time Tate took out an unsuspecting employee with a blind-side hit equal in force to a Ford truck traveling 20 mph straight at you!

2) Have you ever wanted to surprise your significant other and just weren't sure if he or she would like it? Pizza Hut appealed to all the aspiring romantic men out there that "give it the old college try," but find themselves a few pennies short of a dime. In this commercial a boyfriend tells his girlfriend to "Close your eyes, I have a surprise for you." The commercial cuts to a couch inside her apartment with the boyfriend pigging out on the Pizza Hut's stuffed crust gold pizza with his girlfriend asking if she can open her eyes yet in the background. Showing that the spirit of giving is just as satisfying as receiving. If this new stuffed crust pizza is not enough to send you to the hospital, you can thank Pizza Hut for yet another excuse to hit the new gym!

3) Maybe it's because of my keen eye for theatrical happenings, but I was extremely impressed by some of the upcoming movies hitting the theater this summer. Leading off is "Terminator 3: Rise of the Machine." Fighting futurist robots are hell-bent on destroying human civilization, and only one "being" can save John Connors from eminent doom. His name is Arnold Schwarzenegger. With high-tech explosions and great storylines, this is one movie to catch. Next was the "Matrix" sequel. I loved the first installment of this saga, and if previews are any indication, we should be in for another entertaining ride in "Matrix 2: Reloaded." Constant action with Morphous and Neo trying to save what is left of the human resistance.

Honorable Mentions

The Budweiser Clydesdale horses involved in a football game take a timeout to review the previous play. At first you see a horse diving for a football, then that play is rewound on a portable television. Eventually the camera pans out to see that the referee zebra was reviewing a play with both horse teams watching on intently.

Diet Pepsi also came on strong with a Woodstock-like piece. A young male is bouncing around at a mud-concert, only to look over to his left to see his dad head-banging only 10 feet away. Dumbfounded at the sight, the kid witnesses his dad pull out a Diet Pepsi, taking a sip and continuing his moshing.

The Less Than Good

Cadillac! It was like a bad dream reoccurring, with Cadillac appearing as the glaring "Which choice of the set does not belong" answer. As the culture of Super Bowl commercials change to a battleground of highly sophisticated and comical staging grounds, we had Cadillac in its ever too familiar side view of its cars with Low APR financing graphics. While Cadillac may have a quality car, having Tate try to tackle one of its cars might have been more suitable.

Finally, how about Gatorade's commercial with Michael Jordan playing his younger self? It was a nifty idea to have the current MJ playing (on the Wizards) playing one-on-one with his younger self (on the Bulls), but I don't think anyone really made the connection to Gatorade at all during the commercial.

And think, this all happened between the whistles.

Coaches win championships

In Tampa, birds chirp at the return of their swashbuckling heroes. In California, the colors black and silver have been retired and those who persist in wearing them are shunned with glares while barbed invectives are hurled at them with the consistency of a well-manicured crème brûlée. In Peking, a butterfly flaps its wings. In Illinois, a pale virgin with auburn tresses is caught out in the rain. And in a quaint dorm room in Lewisburg, Pa., a small boy sits and rethinks his perception of professional football.

I'm not necessarily talking about how the game is played, how the birth of the mobile quarterback takes pressure off the running back position, nor am I talking about the integrity of athletes, revamping overtime, vapid commentary, incompetent referees or the pitiful future of the Cincinnati Bengals. I am referring to coaching.

Now I don't pretend to know the intricacies of the head coaching position. I do know that on a football team, the head coach has an almost unidentifiable number of assistants, and his own job can range from general management duties to third string offensive line coach.

I think the importance of a coach is solely determinant on two accessories: the style of headset he wears and the size of his clipboard. Whereas Raiders coach Bill Callahan is used to the single-ear headset and the banal 8.5-by-11-inch playbook he waves around, Buccaneers coach Jon Gruden wears the double-ear set and boasts an 11-by-17-inch board.

What all this leads up to is the importance of redefining the adage that has stuck with football for a good number of years. What formerly read "Offense wins games; defense wins championships," I hereby modify to read "Players win games; coaches win championships." Heretofore, all usage of these words in the English language will cease and I will be given full rights and credit for their employment in daily speech, including all uses of the semicolon.

It makes sense though. More and more these days, coaching has been the difference. Last year we watched Bill Belichek run defensive circles around Mike Martz, who was so flummoxed that someone deciphered his offensive hieroglyphs that the only way he saw fit to respond was by using the exact same scheme the next season. Meanwhile, every team with a VCR pored over Super Bowl XXXVI with the scrutiny of a De Beers appraiser like it was the Rosetta Stone.

Belichek's schemes won that championship. He willed his team to success and took it on his back when he was told he didn't stand a chance to beat the Rams. Tom Brady, Adam Vinatieri, Troy Brown … nothing without Belichek to keep them solid.

This year the big news was Tampa Bay's hefty trade for Jon Gruden, which paid out pretty well for the Bucs. The fact that it cost Tampa Bay four draft picks and a few million just to get Gruden out of his old contract, not to mention pay for a new one, is a pretty good sign where priorities have shifted.

Meanwhile, heir apparent to the Raiders, Bill Callahan, decided not to tinker with a working watch. And they were successful until they faced the man who built the offense in the first place. Did it not occur to Callahan that Gruden might be able to deconstruct their plays a little more adeptly than the average head coach in the league? We're not talking about Ranger Joe here. Gruden is a little smarter than the average bear when it comes to the Raiders. At one point in the broadcast, Buccaneer safety Jon Lynch said something about the Raiders offense to the effect of "It's exactly what coach showed us, it's exactly what we practiced."

And now, so much emphasis is being placed on the coach these days that Dallas Cowboys owner Jerry Jones has signed Bill Parcells to head his team. This matchup has "catastrophic succubus of all that is good" written all over it. It's like bad cop-bad cop. Neither of these men have shared so much as a sandwich since they were playing with blocks at recess. But the desire for Jones to field a winning team is enough to submit (to what extent remains to be seen) to Parcells' desires and lure him out of retirement with visions of sugarplums and KFC popcorn chicken.

Most recently, place kicker Mike Vanderjagt of the Indianapolis Colts spoke out against quarterback Peyton Manning and coach Tony Dungy (former Buccaneer coach deposed by Gruden himself) for not having enough flare to take the Colts to the championship. And although he may just be a kicker, he does have a point. It takes a certain coach to guide a team to a Super Bowl win.

I heard once that the most difficult thing for coaches to do is to go into the locker room at halftime of the Super Bowl and tell their team that the strategy that worked all season is failing and that they need to start from scratch. If this is the case, Bill Callahan obviously lost his voice because when the Raiders took the field in the second half, they didn't bother with the formality of "trying."

But coaching legends like Bill Walsh, Jimmy Johnson or Bill Parcells guide their teams through adversity and ultimately, through other teams. Coaches aren't just necessary for success, they're fundamental. A good coach molds a team; a great coach drives a team. It seems fitting that the ultimate football award should be named after a head coach.

The Super Bowl–have we forgotten about the game?

By Mark Walker
Staff Writer

If you ask me, Super Bowl Sunday should be considered a national holiday. For about four hours, the nation seemingly shuts down, as people of all ages and interests gather around the television to watch the big game with friends and family. Does this mean that on Super Bowl Sunday, the whole country suddenly becomes NFL fans? Not at all! People who do not like football watch the Super Bowl for many reasons that have nothing to do with the game. For example, some people tune in to see Hollywood stars on display, while others tune in to watch the funny commercials.

It does not at all bother me that many people are uninterested in the game itself and will not remember the final score an hour after the game ends. What does bother me is when all of the hype and hoopla that surrounds the Super Bowl gets in the way of the game and the fans that do care about its outcome. From warm-ups to the post-game ceremony, unneeded distractions continually disrupt the game.

Throughout the game, a larger than normal amount of commercials were aired. Like most people, I enjoy the Super Bowl commercials, but not when they have commercial breaks both before and after kickoffs! Obviously, ABC had to get sponsors, but the amount of commercial time could have been significantly shortened had the network not repeatedly promoted its own shows like "Alias," "Jimmy Kimmel Live" and "Are You Hot." As a result of the extended commercial breaks the teams had greater difficulty maintaining momentum and intensity throughout the media timeouts.

Perhaps the greatest disruption for fans came in the first half when Central Pennsylvania's ABC affiliate decided to interrupt the game to fulfill their commitment to show the lottery drawing. Many Raider fans surely had flashbacks to the "Heidi Bowl" as this occurred. For one or two minutes, the Super Bowl was condensed into a tiny box in the lower left corner, while the Pennsylvania Lottery drawing was shown with sound in a much larger box. It is appalling that the lottery was considered more important than the Super Bowl! For the few people whose lives might have been hinging on the outcome of the lottery, ABC could have simply flashed the winning numbers across the bottom of the screen.

Then came the famous Super Bowl halftime show. This year, we were treated to performances by Shania Twain, No Doubt and Sting. For about 30 minutes, Qualcomm Stadium was converted from a football stadium to a concert venue. The field was flooded with screaming fans and pyrotechnics as the performers sang (or pretended to sing) their hit songs. Providing halftime entertainment would be great if it were not for the fact that it doubles the length of halftime. Extending halftime gives players more time to tighten up in the locker room and to lose the rhythm of the game. At the same time, it offers the coaches more time to regroup and change their game plans, which could give an unfair advantage to a team that needs to make more adjustments.

Another consequence of the halftime spectacular is the smoke that it leaves behind. During the first few plays of the second half, smoke from the pyrotechnics lingered in the stadium, which was surely somewhat disruptive to the players and fans in the stadium.

When the game finally ended with the Bucs winning 48-21, the distractions still did not conclude. After pulling off the upset, the Bucs wanted nothing more than to hold the cherished Vince Lombardi Trophy. They were kept in suspense, as the NFL brought Bon Jovi on the field to wrap up the season. Being from New Jersey, Bon Jovi is my favorite artist, but I found it absolutely appalling that they would schedule him to play before the Bucs got the Vince Lombardi Trophy. This was the Bucs' golden hour, and bringing Bon Jovi on the field took the spotlight off the Bucs and their accomplishments. Then, after presenting them with the Trophy, Bon Jovi played another song as the Bucs and NFL fans worldwide were left waiting for the MVP announcement. Having just won the Super Bowl, the last thing Tampa Bay's players and fans wanted to do was sit through two Bon Jovi songs before they could get on with the victory celebration.

It is great that the Super Bowl has become such a spectacle that it appeals to just about everyone. People must not lose sight of the real purpose of the Super Bowl. The Hollywood aspects of this event are great as long as they do not interfere with the game. However, every year, the non-football aspects of the Super Bowl overshadow the game more and more. The NFL must step in and prevent the Super Bowl from becoming any more of a circus!

Men's swimming prepares for P.L. Championships

By Lauren O'Connor

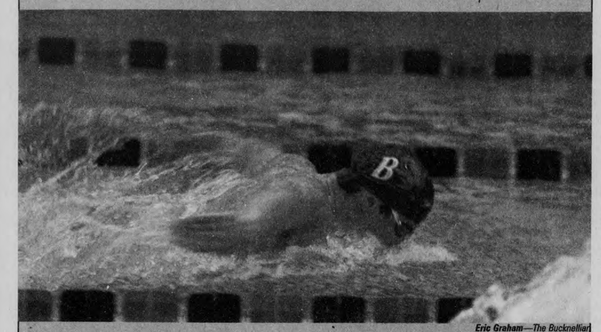
Coming off of two consecutive wins, the Bucknell men's swimming and diving team is hoping to end its season with a 4-2 record by defeating Lehigh and placing well at the Patriot League Championship Meet. Both meets will be held at the Kinney Natatorium. The meet against Lehigh will be held tomorrow. The Patriot League Championships will be held from Feb. 20-22.



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

A Bison swimmer speeds through the water earlier this season at Kinney Natatorium. The Bison are gearing up for the quickly-approaching Patriot League Championships, which take place at Bucknell on Feb. 20-22.

This first goal can be achieved if the men continue to swim well, as they have for the past two meets.

"The [Colgate] meet helped build our confidence and prepare us for our meet against Lehigh in two weeks and for Patriot League Championships," swimmer Todd Bauer '06 said.

Bauer's teammate and classmate Brian Cole '06 said "Lehigh matches up with our squad very well. The only way we can win this meet is to knock off their top swimmers."

As in past meets, all swimmers will be relied on to earn the points that lead to a victory.

"Coach Jerry Foley will be looking at members of each class, especially freshmen Bauer and Mark Kretzer [to swim well]. Diver Adam Freeman '05 will play an integral role in the meet and is expected to defeat the Lehigh divers," Cole said.

Following the Lehigh meet, there will be two weekends without any competitions in order for the team to prepare for the Patriot League Championships. This meet, unlike a duel meets, is held in a trials/finals format. Last year Lehigh won top honors, followed by American, Army and Bucknell, respectively. Bucknell will be looking to improve upon this performance in its new pool.

from a driving Leopard and rifled a baseball pass to Desire Almind '04 for an easy lay up. The stingy defense forced seven Lafayette turnovers in the next 10 minutes, allowing the offense to unleash a 22-9 run that stretched the Bison lead to 70-58. Franks scored seven points to pace an offense that included scores from six different players. The Bison were never threatened the rest of the game and cruised to a 14-point victory.

The Orange and Blue's triple threat was somewhat contained in the first half, but knew no limits in the second. Franks, Creamer and Almind combined to shoot almost 60 percent from the floor and had nine steals. They amassed 70 of Bucknell's 87 points.

Point guard Lindsey Geosits '06 fires off a shot during last Sunday's game. The Bison dominated Lafayette, winning the contest 87-73.

"It's a much more fun game when we get out and run," All-Patriot League candidate Franks said. "We love to try and wear teams out and beat them down."

Franks scorched the nets with 26 points, including 3-5 from downtown, to lead the way. Almind dominated the low post with lay ups en route to 22 points. Creamer recorded 22 points and a season-high 13 assists for her third double-double of the season. "Obviously it's a huge advantage for Des and I to have Molly out there," Franks said. "It's great when we have Molly handing us the ball under the hoop for lay ups."

The Bison square off today at 5:30 p.m. before traveling to Holy Cross on Sunday at 1 p.m.

Chris Niesz '05 charges downcourt against Lafayette on Sunday. The Bison defeated the Leopards 68-48.

Quinn finished the contest with 12 points in his second consecutive double-figure scoring game. Bettencourt finished with nine points, four assists and three steals, while Lalugba tallied his 10th double-double of the 2002-2003 campaign. It was the squad's largest victory over Lafayette since 1995, when the Bison won 71-49.

The team takes its newfound confidence on the road tonight to Colgate, and will travel to league powerhouse Holy Cross on Sunday for a contest that could potentially be played for first place in the Patriot League. Flannery emphasized the squad's primary focus on Colgate during the week, rather than preparing the team for Holy Cross as well.

"It has been a real good group to work with. Everyone is looking forward to going up to Colgate and Holy Cross this weekend," Flannery said. "The way that we have approached these weekend double-headers is to get ready for Holy Cross on Saturday. During the week we don't speak much of it."

Quinn and Webber spoke similarly to Flannery about the upcoming weekend matchups.

"As a player, we approach these games one at a time," Quinn said. "The only opponent on our minds right now is Colgate. We cannot count on things falling in the right place to set up a first place game with Holy Cross. We just have to go out there and play because we are the only team that we can control. It is too early to worry about the Patriot League standings."

Though not stressed, the team realizes this weekend's significance in the standings.

"This is our biggest weekend of the year," Webber said. "We have a chance to move way up in the standings and set a tone going into the second half of league play. Anytime you can get wins on the road it is good. We need to stay focused in practice and everything will be fine."

The Bison face off against Colgate at 7:45 p.m. graduation, those events are open to Bucknell's Daniela Faas '04 in the 1,000 and 500 free, and either Mary Krakowski '06 or Jackie Feinthel '05 in the 200 fly.

This week marks the beginning of taper for the team, an elongated period of rest before its championship meet. Physical and mental preparation are essential, and after a strong base of training, this year's taper should be highly successful.

In the 2002 Patriot League Championships at Navy, the women finished 2nd behind Navy 663-632. Earlier this year, the Bison were able to defeat the Naval Academy in a duel meet 163-137.

This win puts the Bison women in position to win this year's title. Look for strong performances by Daniela Faas '04, Darby Golino '03, Meghan Freese '04 and Jamie Flick '05. Faas medaled three times last year in the 1,650 free (1st), the 500 free (2nd) and the 400-meter individual medley (3rd). Co-captain Golino and Flick were silver medalists in the 100 and 200 backstrokes and the 100 and 200 breast strokes, respectively. Freese brought home a win in the 50 free and a silver medal in the 100 free.

With this season's experience, and the graduation of medal winners from both Lehigh and American, the team is in a much stronger position than a year ago.

"You can't start finishing until you have finished starting," Assistant Coach Sandy Elion said. "Our meet against Lehigh will be the end of what we started in a flawless duel meet season, and I have full confidence that we can finish with a win at Championships."

Look for the Bison women as they continue their season against Lehigh this weekend at the Kinsey Natatorium.

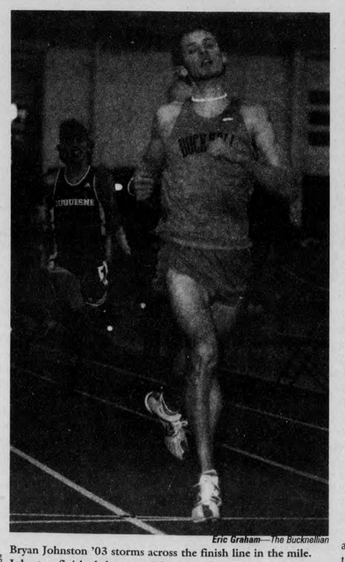
Piper '03 placed 3rd in the 800-meter run, Monique Boley '04 placed 5th and Charity Brady '03 placed 5th in the 500 and 400, respectively, and the 4x400-meter relay contingent of Calvo, Piper, Boley, and Brady placed 4th.

Donner praised Kayla Halloran '06 and Jen O'Connor '06 in the mile, Tolu Fayanjuola '05 in the high jump and Abby Bouzan-Kaloustian '04 in the pole vault for strong individual showings.

"We really need to focus on staying healthy and being able to train at or close to 100 percent. Some of our athletes need to start perceiving themselves more as big time athletes. Our tough schedule will eventually force them to do so," Donner said.

The players realize they have to improve as well.

"We are a young team and we are going to have to keep working hard to contend for the league championship again this year," Piper said.



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Bryan Johnston '03 storms across the finish line in the mile. Johnston finished the race with a time of 4:17.29.

The next step towards leagues will be taken this weekend as the Bison play host to seven schools.

"On the men's side, St. Francis has a well-balanced team throughout all the events, and Rider is very much improved and is especially strong in the sprints, hurdles and jumps," Donner said. "Look for some very fast times in the 55 hurdles from the Rider guys along with some very hot middle distance events. On the women's side, Duquesne looks to be a very tough team along with Rider and St. Francis. I expect the long jump and the shot put to be the featured events. I am predicting it will take close to 18 feet to make the final in the long jump and over 40 feet to make the final in the shot put."

Off-Broadway musical on campus

By Alyson Walker
Features Editor

"I Love You, You're Perfect, Now Change," a musical about the ups and downs of dating, mating, marriage, parenthood, divorce and all the embarrassing incidents they create, was performed last Friday at the Weis Center for the Performing Arts.

The cast, consisting of Charma Bonanno, Neal Young, Kate Willinger and Joe Ricci, was accompanied by pianist David Wolfson and violinist Marilyn Savilla. The actors played a variety of different roles throughout the many skits that made up each act.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Charma Bonanno and Neal Young performed in "I Love You, You're Perfect, Now Change." Both students and actors enjoyed the show.

The first act opened with all four actors on stage in white robes, making Biblical references to the creation of mankind and the order to go forth and multiply. It then segued into the turmoil of dating. Skits included "The Men who Talk and the Women who Pretend to Listen," which showed two different couples on dates. Both women pretend to enjoy their dinner conversation while they make asides to the audience about their lies and frustration. Both women, although bored, ultimately decide to give their dates another chance because of the shortage in good men.

Another skit mocked the lack of time left for dating in people's hectic schedules. The woman meets the man for the first date and immediately asks if they can just pretend they are on the second date because she's a very busy woman and does not have time to waste. The two begin to skip through their relationship to their third date, their first time consummating the relationship, their first argument, the breakup and the first time they see each other post-breakup. The two decide that the relationship cannot work and promptly say goodnight.

The first act closed with a scene about cold feet before a wedding, with the ministers taunting the bride and groom about whether or not they really want to get married. After testing them with statements such as "His family is your family now" and "Your bachelor days are over," the two realize they do love each other and decide to marry.

Jessica Orsulak '05 enjoyed the show, which she found was based upon common conceptions of relationships.

"The show played on a lot of stereotypes, but they were things that most couples can completely identify with," Orsulak said.

While the first act focused on the trip to the altar, the second act dealt with what comes after the wedding day. In "What Happened to Baby's Parents," a couple with a new child entertains their single friend with a slide show of Junior while speaking in baby talk. They are so enraptured with their own child that they kiss the baby monitor every time they think Junior might have cried. At one point, the mother says to the father, "I'm so glad you fertilized my egg." The frustrated friend complains to the father about the change in his behavior and leaves his bewildered friend, saying to call when Junior's out of the house.

"They could not have more accurately portrayed relationships in America. The play captured the ridiculous nature of the modern relationship/marriage," Mark Perna '03 said.

Other skits dealt with a family car trip, dating after the death of a partner and the time spent waiting for someone in a relationship—either at the mall, the game or in a line for the bathroom.

One skit portrayed a woman filming a dating tape after getting divorced. "The First Dating Video of Rose Ritz" was performed with Bonanno sitting with her back to the audience, facing a video camera. The audience saw her face through a television, as though they were the men who would eventually watch the video. She tries at first to make a happy and upbeat video, but she returns again and again to her divorce and how she felt about her husband leaving her for an older woman. Bonanno said that "Rose Ritz" is her favorite scene to perform.

"I never quite know exactly where [Rose Ritz] is going to go—it's recreated at the moment, depending on the audience," Bonnano said. "It's always unexpected; it's always fresh."

Young said that audiences tend to receive the show differently.

"I sing 'Shouldn't I be Less in Love with You?' which I enjoy because it explores the experiences of many. It's a very affirmative piece about marriage and love," Young said. "I also enjoy 'Stud and Babe' because it's just a lot of fun."

Young said that the show is received differently by audiences. Certain parts get bigger laughs depending upon the crowd and their personal experiences. He explained why the show has been so popular.

"The show spans from the first date to kids to divorce and treats them all with a soft, comic touch," Young said.

Bonanno and Young said that there are approximately four or five other productions of "I Love You, You're Perfect, Now Change" currently running in North America. Bonanno is in her second season with the show and Young began touring in August. The largest crowd they have performed for on this tour was approximately 2,600 people. Both enjoyed performing at the Weis Center because the loud laughter resonated throughout the entire hall.

"There's nothing like that feeling of getting a good laugh," Bonanno said.

New exhibit opens in Samek Art Gallery

Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

A student admires Agnes Denes' "Projects for Public Spaces." The exhibit runs through April 6.

By Josh Herwitt
Staff Writer

After the success of the Samek Art Gallery's presentation of "Öyvind Fahlström: The Complete Graphics and Multiples" and "Lewis deSoto: Paranirvana (self-portrait)," a new collection of fine art has arrived on campus. The Samek Art Gallery will be host to "Agnes Denes: Projects for Public Spaces" until April 6.

The opening of the exhibition featured New York art critic and author Eleanor Heartney discussing Denes' work in heavy detail. Curated by Dan Mills, the exhibition displays proposal drawings and other images, models, sculpture and writings of significant public projects that Denes has concentrated on since 1968. A woman overflowing with experience through the social sciences, the humanities and the arts, her ability to visualize these experiences and bring them to life in her artwork is compelling.

In past years, Denes' display and discussion of ecological, cultural and social issues dominated much of her work. Recently, her work has focused on environmental assemblies, such as her 1982 "Wheatfield A Confrontation: Battery Park Landfill, Downtown Manhattan" representing the confrontation between nature and urbanization in New York City.

Another theme displayed throughout Denes' work is the nature of human societies. Her photographs of sheep representing human society are not only humorous, but thought-provoking as well. In Denes' unusual assembled set "Pyramids," she uses tiny figures to demonstrate the abstract notion of human societies. Other pyramid forms are curvilinear, presenting an abstract, untraditional form to geometric shapes. Her work on "Tree Mountain" also illustrates this concept.

Denes has had much of her work displayed in over 300 solo and group exhibitions in the past. Her past awards include four National Endowments and the Rome Prize. Currently living and working in New York, she conducts research at Carnegie Mellon University, Massachusetts Institute of Technology and New York University and attends conferences around the globe.

The Samek Art Gallery is located on the third floor of the Langone Center and is open Monday to Friday from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m., Saturday and Sunday from 1-4 p.m. and by appointment.

Dixie Chicks: Q&A with students

By Elisabeth Hulette
Staff Writer

Never having been very into awards shows, it was with a slight tilt of my head, a momentary "Huh" and about 3.2 seconds of interest that I regarded the upcoming date for this year's Grammy Awards, set for Feb. 23. It was perhaps with another 1.6 seconds that I considered the Dixie Chicks' nomination for the Best Album of the Year award. After all, I do own the album that elicited the honor in question. But it was not until I was asked to write about the nomination that I began to think about the Dixie Chicks in detail.

So after emerging from a brief period of serious thought, here is what I know about the Dixie Chicks: The group consists of three blonde women who, if nothing else, are talented enough to play their own accompaniment. They have released three albums over the past few years, the most recent of which, "Home," seems to be regarded as the most impressive (as evidenced by their Grammy nomination). The album contains a certain degree of bluegrass influence that sets it apart from the Chicks' other work, and includes a cover version of "Landslide," a song first released by Fleetwood Mac.

The thought did occur to me that even though I may not be entirely well-versed in the Dixie Chicks, there may be people on campus who are. I spent a portion of my Saturday evening asking people in the Bison, some familiar, some not so familiar, the burning question, "How do you feel about the Dixie Chicks?"

The results of my first attempts were discouraging.

One unsuspecting student, Andrew Makar '03, said, "I've heard their music, but I don't really know who they are."

Dan Cross '05, who gave me a bit of a strange look when I inquired about his opinion on the Dixie Chicks, said, "I wouldn't go to one of their concerts." With regard to their Grammy nomination, he said, "I don't really care."

Hmm. Then I thought, perhaps I could get some more in-depth answers if I asked girls instead. Responses began to warm up.

"The only time I ever heard them was at the country line dance place in my home town," Lauren Lombardo '05 said, hurriedly stressing that she has only visited said country line dance place once.

Louise Welling '04 said, "I love country music," and remains the only person who openly admitted that.

Janet Forney '04, when asked if she would consider attending a concert by the Dixie Chicks, responded with a sentiment likely felt by many Bucknellians bored of central Pennsylvania.

"I just want to go to a concert in general- I don't care what it is," Forney said.

"I don't really like country music, but I think the Dixie Chicks cross over [to pop music]. They make me want to sing at the top of my lungs," said Carolyn Strickland, associate director of Campus Activities and Programs.

Aha! I thought. Now we're getting somewhere.

At one table in the Bison I finally struck gold—a whole group of Dixie chick fans, and opinionated ones at that.

"The Dixie Chicks set a role model for the majority of American women who have been divorced," Brandy Fetters '03 said.

"They've been through all these trials and tribulations, and they've still been successful," Katie Baldwin '03 said.

Kathy Morgan '03 said the Chicks "weren't even shy about performing while pregnant, which is awesome."

Baldwin, glancing questioningly in her direction, said, "unless you're Demi Moore on the cover of GQ."

Fetters summing up her support for the trio, said, "I feel that I am a Chick."

Kristen Hughes '06, recalling an older Dixie Chicks tune, said, "The only song I really know by them is the one where they kill that guy."

I immediately recognized her reference to "Goodbye Earl," a song on the Chicks' album "Fly," which describes an abusive husband who is poisoned and disposed of by his wife and her best friend—"Those black-eyed peas/ they tasted all right to me/ Earl/ Ain't it dark/ wrapped up in that tarp/ Earl, hey!"

Fetters said, about the same song, that the Chicks were "very risky with 'Goodbye Earl.' I think Earl did have to die."

"I think Earl had to die, but I'm not sure I support it," Morgan said.

Male support for the Dixie Chicks turned out to be available after all, but hiding in alternate locations.

Nick Scott '04 said, "I got one of their CDs for Christmas, but I haven't listened to it yet."

Scott also said that one of his co-workers at National Park Services in Vermont listens to the Dixie Chicks. Aha! I thought again—maybe fans of the Dixie Chicks congregate in Vermont!

Scott, not supporting my claim, said that in Vermont, "There are people who listen to rap, country and other music, just like any other state."

So there you have it—the Dixie Chicks have somewhat of a following on Bucknell's campus, their more violent songs seem to draw the most support and their fan network is mostly concentrated in the female contingent, at least outside of Vermont. As for their nomination, it appears that most people around here don't really care, although perhaps they will if the Chicks actually win. Maybe we'll even be inspired to go country line dancing. Picture it—cowboy hats and boots all over campus, Bucknellians lassoing the bison.

Uptown packed for punk band

Students filled Uptown to see Simple Plan, a band on Vans' Warped Tour

By Dave Allen
Staff Writer

Hundreds of students filled Uptown for a concert by the French-Canadian punk band Simple Plan last Saturday. The band has played to much larger crowds on the Vans' Warped Tour, but their solid, energetic performance generated an enthusiastic response from the audience.

> "I thought [the band] did a good job. There was a lot of energy and sweaty people here tonight,"
> —Jeff Livesay '05

The band tore through every song from its debut album, "No Pads, No Helmets ... Just Balls," singing lyrics about the confusion and unhappiness of being a teen-ager. There was much interaction between the band and the crowd. Lead singer Pierre Bouvier conversed with the audience and encouraged them to participate by clapping, jumping or doing call-and-response. The audience sang along with all of the band's songs, not just "I'd Do Anything" and "I'm Just a Kid," which have been played on MTV and WVBU.

They also included a cover of "American Jesus" by the band Bad Religion, one of the progenitors of the American punk rock scene.

Although the sound of the guitars occasionally overpowered the singing and made the lyrics indistinct, bassist David Desrosiers and guitarist Sebastien Lefebvre could be heard singing effective and tuneful harmonies with Bouvier. Bouvier, Desrosiers, Lefebvre and guitarist Jeff Stinco performed many leaps in unison as drummer Chuck Comeau pummeled each song to its conclusion. In appreciation of the audience, the band threw souvenir guitar picks into the crowd and doused the dancing and bouncing fans with bottles of water.

Bouvier greeted the audience with "Hello, Philadelphia!" when he took the stage. Later in the show, he asked exactly where he was.

A Simple Plan's Pierre Bouvier performs at Uptown. The audience sang along to Bouvier's songs including "I'll Do Anything," and "I'm Just a Kid." Uptown was filled to capacity throughout the entire performance.

"It said 'Philadelphia' on the tour schedule," Bouvier said. "When you're on tour, sometimes you forget where you are."

After the concert, fans swarmed the pool table room at Uptown, where the band set up a stand selling T-shirts, compact discs and stickers. All of the band members signed autographs and posed for pictures.

Shawn Walters '06 said he enjoyed the concert enough to buy the band's CD and get it autographed.

"I had heard a few songs before ... I thought the show was great."

Jeff Livesay '05 said he enjoyed the effort the band made to interact with the audience.

"Although I hadn't heard the band before the concert, I thought they did a good job. There was a lot of energy and sweaty people here tonight," Livesay said.

Animated poet entertains small crowd

Sean Thomas Dougherty read to a dedicated crowd on Super Bowl Sunday

By Melinda Kummer
A&E Editor

As snow quickened the steps of anyone brave enough to emerge from warm dorms, in a pristine room with wooden pews, a dedicated few ignored the mass hysteria over new commercials and the big game. Sean Thomas Dougherty, a nationally acclaimed performance poet, visited Bucknell Hall on Sunday for an evening arguably better than the entertainment value of some not-as-funny-as-in-previous-year's commercials.

Photos by Melinda Kummer*—The Bucknellian*

Thomas Dogherty keeps the audience's attention with an energetic performance. His poems focused on the struggles of the working class.

Black skull cap and hooped earrings framed the face of a poet who does not give orthodox poetry readings. His New York accent pattered in urban rhythm and always returned to jazz allusions. Described by its author as "discoursive oral tradition," Dougherty's style reminisced of the early slam movement. Heavily influenced by African-American culture, he looked to poets like Sonia Sanchez while finding inspiration in his stepfather, his great-grandmother, his wife and his neighborhood.

Dougherty, speaking "against the inscription of otherness," focused on themes depicting the working-class struggle in Erie, Pa., where he is the assistant director of creative writing at Penn State Behrend. Sympathetic to the struggle of the factory worker, his poetry uncovers the disillusionment of humanity.

"When a poet can take moths and speak of 'moths of snowflakes on windows,' the poet becomes successful in making the mind think of things on a level above normal and ordinary," Assistant Professor of English Lisa Roney said about Dougherty's accessible themes enhanced by profound descriptions.

Using the canzone as a basic structure, Dougherty molds his themes into rhythms and beats of start-and-stop storytelling, weaving them all together in the end. He poeticized the Brooklyn Dodgers in a performance piece, a favorite with the audience. In a game where Jackie Robinson was the rumored hero who pushed baseball from a "bourgeois game to blues," Dougherty spoke of the Dodgers as Lincoln's "dream team."

"My favorite part was how [Dougherty] talked about his background and turned it into his inspiration," Kristen Lunny '05 said.

Dougherty's visit was sponsored by the Bucknell Association for the Arts and the Stadler Center for Poetry. A calendar of future readings in Bucknell Hall can be found on the Stadler Center's Web page.

Abroad Perspective: Vienna, Austria

It's a cloudy morning in Vienna—the sun does not seem to like Vienna much, and even the streets seem moody and a little forlorn, but very romantic. I am standing in front of the Hofburg, where centuries of Habsburgs, the rulers of the Austrian and Holy Roman Empires, once lived, breathed and eventually fell from grace with the onslaught of modernity in its most tragic form: World War I. I am waiting for my History of the Habsburg Empire professor to show us around the Imperial Apartments where Empress Elisabeth, the wife of Franz Joseph, a legendary beauty and a top tourist draw, once lived.

I am thinking about the past, but the very much alive city, choking on the exhaust of tiny cars, ladies in outrageous fur coats and the obnoxious tunes of cell phones, remind me that there is indeed a present. Despite the lavish Baroque architecture and rapidly aging population, Vienna is alive.

On every street corner, campaigners distribute pens, leaflets, even wine and flowers—Austria is a democracy and elections are in two days for the Bundeskanzler, the head of government. I'm wondering if I would have voted for George Bush had his campaigners given me wine, when suddenly I hear the "Imperial March." There's a parade, and out of nowhere appear hundreds of people dressed to the nines. Marching past me, they frighten the horses and cause traffic to stop with their display of grandeur and wealth. It's Otto von Habsburg's 90th birthday, and the Viennese have come out in droves to worship the son of their last emperor in typical Viennese fashion. I cannot help but think of the irony: it's nearly election day, and yet the Viennese are marching around Vienna as if lamenting the fall of a monarchy. Suddenly I realize that Europe's complexities and quirks are more than I had expected, and I am enchanted.

When I left America to study in Vienna with the International Education of Students, I was confident that I was an enlightened American. Being prone to socialism, I would understand the "European" attitude, and, of course, find it infinitely superior to my fallen America. I chose Austria because I love the German language, opera and have watched "The Sound of Music" more times than I care to admit. I figured I was already better off than most Americans. I knew that "Edelweiss" was not the national anthem, that yodeling isn't exactly considered hip and that the von Trapp family from the film actually fled to Eagle's Nest, in Germany, in that scene when they are climbing every mountain to Switzerland (an impossibility). It's not exactly where I'd choose to go when attempting to evade the Nazis.

So, as you might imagine, I had a few surprises. Yes, I was in Austria, but in Vienna, which is geographically so eastward that I was closer to Slovakia, Hungary, Slovenia and Croatia than any other main Austrian city. I found that Vienna was filled with Eastern influences (mainly Turkish), as a sort of bizarre midpoint for where Western and Central Europe meet that belongs wholly to neither. The Cold War may be over, but the division between a rich Western Europe and a poorer East is not.

Secondly, I was prepared to speak pidgin German and be laughed at as the stupid American monoglot, until I realized that I couldn't understand the Wiener dialect, which is not exactly what I learned in German class. Moreover, in November it rained like the city had itself confused with London, and a professor told us that Vienna had one of the highest suicide rates in the world. Was it because the Blue Danube is a murky gray?

I must admit I was intrigued by the cynical veneer and dry humor of the Viennese, which seemed deeply embedded in the rich culture of the city. It would take me four months to realize that my American mind could never comprehend what it is to lose two World Wars. In some ways, Vienna, despite its modernity and ability to push forward into the future, continues to nurse a wounded psyche as the loser of the century, in deep denial about its practically nonexistent resistance to the Nazi annexation.

Along with my intellectual development came some personal revelations. The Europe that I have tended to idealize had a few snags. Tourism was all-pervasive, and while Vienna heavily relies on tourism for revenue, natives have the tendency to roll their eyes at tourists and correct their attempts at German. My purist heart was set on discerning "true" Austrian culture, but I learned that this was impossible—there is no easy definition of Austrian culture, and for that matter, American culture.

Imagine this: one day I broke down with cravings for french fries and went to McDonald's. I'm guiltily devouring my fries, telling myself I should really be eating schnitzel, and teen-age kids are on every side of me. They are speaking German, but every so often there is a interjection of some of English's best known four-letter words, and Eminem is playing on the radio. They know the words better than I ever will. Meanwhile, someone in that McDonald's is cursing those damn Americans, for sullying their culture turning the world upside down and making the "Lord of the Rings" movies, which everyone flocked to see in mad numbers when they debuted. Call it cultural imperialism, hypocrisy, stupidity or the weakness/lack of an Austrian culture, but I am fascinated with this love/hate relationship with Americans.

Before I opened my mouth, most people knew I was an American, and treated me gingerly, as if I would destroy the environment under their feet with my pesticides or burst out in song with a George Cohan ditty. They certainly didn't worship me as I had once worshipped them, but my desire to talk to as many people as possible helped me (at least I like to think so) dispel a few of those nasty rumors about the "Ugly American." I'll fondly and proudly remember being in a sleeper car with a German man and a French woman en route to Vienna from Paris. I had the opportunity to speak German and French, but learned humility when I realized they both understood each other's languages and were fluent in English as well.

I'll remember telling a German that I was interested in human rights and socio-economic justice, and watching his face change from wonderment to a new understanding about the complexities of what an American is. He had seen on CNN that about 50-60 percent of Americans supported the Bush administration (which Germany is not too wild about), and figured that percentage-wise I was more likely to fall into that neat category. I think he learned that day that labeling people has its pitfalls, and not to watch CNN.

I'll remember sitting in a coffeehouse that Trotsky supposedly frequented, sipping my coffee, daintily devouring my chocolate and watching the Viennese go by. I'll remember standing in front of Saint Stephan's Cathedral, losing myself in Gothic magnificence and trying to feign a spiritual epiphany, as opposed to my very real sense of sensual fulfillment.

I'll remember having the opportunity to see nine different countries boating on both the Seine and the Danube, exploring the endless riches of the Vatican and the unspeakable horrors of Auschwitz-Birkenau.

I'll remember going to the U.N. headquarters in Vienna and seeing, for the first time in my life, people from nearly every nation in the world in one big room, united to raise money for impoverished children worldwide.

But I think most of all I'll remember a place that is lost somewhere between the Strauss waltzes and aristocratic manners of the past and a present that includes a whole other nation of "Sex and the City" fanatics, the best chocolate cake and coffee ever and a charm that is timeless.

Greenway Project helps river area

By Ashley Maliken
Staff Writer

The Greenway Project is a organization that has high hopes for the Susquehanna River. The group plans to bring new cultural and recreational opportunities to Lewisburg through its proposed renovations for the river area.

With the help of University students and faculty, orchestrated in part by Assistant Professor of English Alfred Siewers, these hopes may very well be realized. Their goals may seem lofty to the faint of heart, but they're willing to commit the time and energy necessary to make these changes happen. These changes will affect the entire Lewisburg community.

Each and every one of us has come in contact with the Susquehanna River that flows nearby. Be it the location where your team practices its rowing technique, or simply a body of water you notice when driving over the Market Street bridge, its existence has undoubtedly come to your attention. It is doubtful that many have actually taken the time to appreciate the river and what it has to offer. Though right now those opportunities for enjoyment may seem few and far between, there are people within the Lewisburg and University communities who aim to change that.

Among their proposed renovations are a "Greenway" corridor, hiking/biking trails throughout Lewisburg that would eventually link with regional trails and possibly something as grand as an amphitheater. A "Greenway" corridor is a linear park and preserve system that would run the length of the waterway. Composed of both public and private lands, the corridor would help to promote both an aesthetic and ecological upgrade for the river and surrounding beds. According to the Greenway Project, every aspect of the river's quality could use an overhaul, and the years to come would provide a healthy starting point for what could realistically be generations of improvement endeavors.

"We'd like to turn the river into a nature and cultural preserve. It would help provide central Pa. with a cultural focus of identity," Siewers said.

In addition to the previously mentioned proposals, there are artistic and architectural endeavors in the plans as well. Those in charge hope to create art exhibits, photography opportunities and even a television documentary detailing the historical significance of the river to the early Lewisburg community.

They know that none of these dreams will be quickly realized without the assistance of the University's vast resources, so the Greenway Project organizers are designing ways to involve everyone possible. Everyone, from engineers to ecologists, is desired, with a specialized job for each individual.

"The more involvement we obtain, the more pressure there will be to continue improving the river. As more towns begin to feature the river's beauty, more will have to be done," Siewers said.

Who better to help jump-start these immense undertakings than the University? Offering an extensive liberal arts and engineering workforce and a central location, the Greenway Project hopes to make the University the midpoint of all its endeavors. They are approaching the next few years with high hopes for what beauty the future may bring to both Lewisburg and the surrounding areas.

Sophomore charged with attempted statutory rape

By Chris Styers
Business & Politics Editor

Elliot Goldberg '05 is charged with criminal attempt to commit statutory rape, unlawful contact or communication with a minor and criminal attempt to corrupt a minor after charges were filed by the mother of a 13-year-old girl Goldberg met over the Internet.

Similar cases of proposed sexual encounters have been seen at a growing rate across the country, and Orin Kerr, an associate professor at the George Washington University Law School, said that these sexual encounter cases are "by far the most prosecuted of all computer crimes."

In the Goldberg's case, the mother's attentiveness to her daughter's Internet activities helped to discover and prevent a possible sexual encounter. By assuming her daughter's online identity with the help of police, the mother uncovered evidence that Goldberg had intended some sort of interaction.

According to the Patriot News, Goldberg proposed a meeting with the girl at the Susquehanna Valley Mall. Goldberg provided a physical description of himself along with his cell phone number. To confirm Goldberg's identity, the mother and daughter watched him as the girl called his cell phone to cancel the meeting.

Goldberg called the girl back, encouraging her to change her mind. The girl's mother notified state police who employed an expanding tactic in preventing cyber crimes.

According to the Virginia Pilot's Web site, several similar cases have recently appeared in Virginia. Investigators there have assumed the virtual identities of targets of Internet crimes and obtained incriminating evidence.

In Goldberg's case, once the suspect invited the officers, who

Bishop visits University for first time to speak with staff, students

By Jennifer Jenchura
Senior Writer

The Most Rev. Bishop Nicholas C. Dattilo, head of the Harrisburg Diocese paid his first pastoral visit to the University last Sunday.

Dattilo visited the University after an invitation from the Catholic Campus Ministry (CCM) last October and spent the day participating in both an interdenominational worship service and a Catholic Mass, as well as meeting with students.

Members of CCM were excited about the bishop's visit.

"Having the bishop here provided a link to the diocese, which is crucial to continuing Catholic programming on campus. We depend on the diocese for their continuing support and I think it was good to be able to show Bishop exactly what our organization is about and how it works in the daily lives of so many students here at Bucknell," Allison Hoffmann '05 said, a member of CCM Steering Committee.

Datillo spoke to the chapel congregation at the interdenominational worship service in Rooke Chapel.

"I am delighted to be invited by Father Moran and the Administration," Dattilo said.

"The visit was a mutual request. The diocese has been officially part of the University since 1999 when Bucknell and the diocese signed an Agreement of Understanding. In 1998 the diocese opened its first two full-time Catholic ministries at Millersville and Bucknell. Before we were a separate entity. The agreement stems from Bucknell's initiative to look at Jewish programs as well as support Catholics, too," said Catholic Chaplain Martin O. Moran III, who is assigned full time to the University by the diocese.

Having known Dattilo since he was ordained a bishop, Moran made it no secret that he wanted to work in fill-time ministry at a college.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Bishop Nicholas C. Dattilo (left) marks his first visit to the University by presiding over a Catholic mass with Father Martin O. Moran (right) in Rooke Chapel last Sunday. Earlier in the day, Bishop Dattilo delivered a sermon at the interdenominational worship service.

"The availability of a house and priest 24 hours a day makes Newman House a home away from home for all students, Catholic and non-Catholic," Moran said.

Dattilo also stressed the importance of having a Catholic ministry on campus to support Catholic students as well as encourage new priests.

"Bucknell is blessed to be one of just three schools in the diocese with an actual on-campus ministries. Bloomsburg, Millersville and Bucknell are the only three colleges that actually have an on-campus ministry. Father Marty does a great job with the students. It's so easy for young people to get lost. If no one is around to help them, it may be easy not to live [a Catholic life]. If I could, I would put two priests here," Dattilo said.

Installed as the eighth bishop of the Harrisburg diocese in 1990, Dattilo's visit marks first time a bishop has visited campus. Ordained a priest in 1958, Dattilo is Bishop of the Diocese of Harrisburg. The Diocese of Harrisburg encompasses a 15-county region that includes Lewisburg and includes 235,000 parishioners in 89 parishes and three colleges with full-time campus ministries out of the total 22 colleges in the diocese.

The bishop's agenda was as much participation with Catholic and non-Catholic students as possible, according to Moran.

"[Having] the bishop come to visit Bucknell shows that he is really concerned with the way things are in his diocese. I think that he was really impressed with Catholic Campus Ministry, and with Bucknell in general," CCM Steering Committee member Meghan Flynnperrault '05 said.

Delivering the sermon for the interdenominational service, the bishop stressed the importance of helping people.

"Help in the simple things that we do every day. Give for nothing but the sake of helping. At times all of us are poor and needy," Dattilo said.

Following the service Dattilo met with 25 students of CCM for an informal discussion on the role of the bishop in their lives as well as the life of the Catholic Church. He also discussed issues relating to the hierarchy and process of becoming a bishop, his daily responsibilities and the need for a religious support system for college students.

University announces five percent tuition hike

By Rachel Laskow
Senior Editor

The Board of Trustees decided to increase the University's 2003-2004 comprehensive fee by 5 percent, raising it to $35,262, at its Jan. 31 meeting. The comprehensive fee includes $28,764 for tuition, $6,302 for room and board and $196 for the student activity fee. This 5 percent increase comes after an 8.7 percent tuition increase for the 2002-2003 school year. There will also be a 2.5 percent increase for faculty and staff salaries.

"There was lively discussion with the trustees about whether the 5 percent was high enough," University President Steffen Rogers said at Monday's faculty meeting.

According to Ben Marsh, professor of geography and chair of the University Planning and Budget Committee (UPBC), the committee makes a recommendation on the level of increase to the president, who then suggests an appropriate increase amount to the Board of Trustees.

"In light of last year's 8 percent increase, we hoped to keep this year's increase moderate," Marsh said.

This past year, the University's endowment decreased by 15 percent, which was one factor that impacted the Board of Trustees' decision to increase the comprehensive fee.

"The University really needs money this year because of the stock market drop. But what the University needs because of external problems isn't necessarily the responsibility of the present students," Marsh said. "However, we are highly dependent on tuition, so it's hard to see how we are going to get money in the long run without going to students."

According to an e-mail Rogers sent to the University community, parents and students are quick to point out that a 5 percent increase is greater than the cost of inflation.

"With the current state of the economy, students and parents will definitely be hit by this increase. The school must keep this in mind, as Bucknell stays competitive with rival schools and their tuition increases," Bucknell Student Government Vice President of Operations Jack Phillips '04 said.

Rogers reminds the University community that in maintaining its high level of education, additional costs will also be necessary.

Mullan speaks of Bloody Sunday experience

By Meghan Fox
Staff Writer

Don Mullan, author of the book "Eyewitness Bloody Sunday," said "Bloody Sunday was effectively the death of the civil rights movement" in a lecture given Monday evening at the Campus Theatre.

Mullan was a young man of 15 living in Northern Ireland when the events of Jan. 30, 1972 unfolded before his eyes, an incident to be recognized by history as "Bloody Sunday."

"It's important to understand that Bloody Sunday was a watershed in the history of modern Ireland, because it was a moment when history slipped," Mullan said.

On this day, as the Northern Ireland Civil Rights Association was holding a peaceful demonstration, a crack battalion of the British Army called the 1st Battalion Parachute Regiment opened fire on the crowd, killing 13 and wounding 14.

> "The effect of all those events put together was that a couple generations of people simply said there's no such thing as justice. Many young people made the transition from being peace activists to joining the IRA."
> —Don Mullan

The demonstrators were protesting what they considered to be the unfair internment of Irish citizens without trial.

Technically the march was considered illegal.

Due to preceding internal conflict in Northern Ireland, a territory controlled by the United Kingdom, the British ordered a ban on all protests.

Although the Irish Republican Army (IRA) had given their consent to remain out of the march, the British, most likely suspecting a breech of this verbal agreement, occupied the streets to prevent any violent outbreaks.

Among the unarmed protesters was Mullan.

"It was my first civil rights march. I was 15 years of age. My parents gave me permission. I remember the day .... The actual day of Bloody Sunday was a very sunny day, a day like today, here in Lewisburg. There was a great carnival atmosphere with people gathered together. We had no idea we were walking into the valley of death," Mullan said.

As Mullan later said, there were two options available for asserting

Bishop celebrates first University mass

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Bishop Nicholas Dattilo is welcomed to the University by Vice President of Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70. During his visit, the bishop spoke at both the interdenominational and Catholic services, held an informal discussion with students and was the guest of honor at a dinner held in the Terrace Room.

every day, Dattilo compared himself to a CEO.

"I have a $130 million plus budget to work with. Bishops must run their diocese with the morality that Catholicism demands of us."

Dattilo also discussed deeper issues such as the shortage of Catholic priests, sexual misconduct in the church and the church's position on homosexuals and cloning.

"I think the most traumatic thing in life is to leave high school," Dattilo said. "Any university that has one-third of students of the same religion, [that religion] needs to make sure its students are being taken care of, because we don't want young people to feel cut adrift. I wish I had more priests to send to other schools."

Dattilo talked about diversity in the Catholic Church and the University's own diversity of religions on campus. He also reminded students of new diversity in the clergy.

"Just last week the first bishop of Asian ancestry in the United States was announced in San Francisco. Bishop Wang is from China," Dattilo said.

Issues of anti-Catholicism as well as the recent allegations of sexual misconduct within the Church and his own diocese were also brought up by students.

One student asked how to respond to students who overtly disagree with the Catholic religion and Dattilo expressed his concern for the seriousness of anti-Catholicism.

"We shouldn't impose our values on anyone," Dattilo said. "When people say hurtful things it shows a lack of respect. [People] need to make a thoughtful, prayerful decision not to let that inhibit them from practicing their religion. Catholic students are not second-class citizens here. They are our people. You couldn't get away with saying the same type of things about the black and Jewish that you can say about the Catholic Community."

A pastor in Dauphin County of the Bishop's Diocese of Harrisburg recently resigned following an allegation of sexual misconduct nearly 23 years ago. It was Dattilo's job to announce that priest's resignation last April.

"I have a responsibility to make sure we have good priests who are not mistreating people," Dattilo said.

Dattilo firmly stated that the media has given the sexual misconduct issue more than enough coverage.

"Make no mistake about it, the Church is the enemy of the media. How many times do they need to tell that story? It ran in the Harrisburg Patriot newspaper at least two dozen times," Dattilo said. "I agree [sexual abuse] is a terrible thing and it should be reported. It is news and people should be told to a particular priest can't be trusted with kids, but how many times must the story be told? We need to be reporting the good things many Catholic people do, such as the March for Life in Washington, D.C. (on the anniversary of the Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision), instead of when one priest steps out of bounds."

Dattilo also reinforced the Church's position on same-sex marriages.

"The Church cries out against homosexual unions to let the Gospel message be known. If you discredit the Church, you discredit its messages," Dattilo said.

Although Dattilo had never been to the University, he brought along two friends who are University alumni. Drs. Clem Ciccarelli '76 and Ira Packman '71 were happy to be back at the University.

"It is exciting to see groups of young people excited about faith," Ciccarelli said.

Packman, who converted from Judaism to Catholicism after his undergraduate days at Bucknell, said his religion is a huge part of who he is, regardless of his medical background.

"First I am a Catholic and then I am a doctor. Being a Catholic affects your whole life and how you interact with people," Packman said. "Being an alumnus and speaking out about being Catholic and living faith shows the student body that you can be Catholic and live life. [Students] need a community that supports them because Catholicism is still a minority population on campus."

A former member of CCM, Ciccarelli was happy to see the expansion of the Catholic community at Bucknell.

"CCM is getting larger with time and you see more committed Catholics on campus. There is a true health value of religion and family life," Ciccarelli said.

Many current students in CCM believe the bishop's visit will help to reaffirm their faith.

"Bishop Dattilo's visit to the Bucknell campus will really help to strengthen the already strong religious life present at this university. Religion plays such a strong role in so many of our students' lives ... the University will benefit from his affirmation of the importance of faith in our daily, in more ways than we can know," CCM Co-President of Jessica Orsulak '05 said.

Dattilo agrees that today's college students face much more stressful times than when Dattilo was a student, but the faith has not changed much.

"The principles remain the same. If you know the basics of your faith then when the complex issues come up it is easier to not be confused on the choices we make," Dattilo said. "For example, cloning. There was a way God meant for children to come into this world. When people start tinkering with that we know it's wrong from basic principles. Students also have to deal with more life and death issues. It used to be a given when life ends and when life begins. Now it's all taken for granted."

The bishop said he enjoys speaking with college students and does not find it difficult to relate to them.

"When I speak with young men and women I tend to be more casual and let the schedule be what they want. I see them as great kids; they are the future leadership of the church," Dattilo said.

Students agreed they were able to identify with the bishop.

"I think the bishop connected to everyone through his message about being faithful. It is not only important to be faithful to your relationship with God, but also with your relationships to other aspects of life including family, friends and school," CCM Steering Committee member Megan McCarthy '04 said.

Moran deemed the visit a success.

"The administration was overwhelmingly receptive to the visit. President [Steffen] Rogers and Vice President [Charlie] Pollock '70 even hosted the dinner and reception," Moran said. "I think [the bishop] was overwhelmed with the hospitality and receptiveness at Bucknell for a religious leader, as well as the energy of the students and the appreciation by students, faculty and staff."

Awareness and tolerance primary goals of "Raise Your Voice" week

By Jason Oster
Staff Writer

The University will participate in nationwide college campus events collectively known as "Raise Your Voice" week from Feb. 16-22.

More than 200 campuses nationwide are trying to reach students through this week with a wide range of goals. "Raise Your Voice: a week of action," is being sponsored by Campus Compact to increase, celebrate and deepen the student civic engagement efforts on college campuses across the country.

The Office of Service Learning has brought the week of action to the University this year. According to Mia Gadhia '06, the purpose of the event at the University is to get students to become more civic-minded and to decrease the apathy that many college students are stereotyped as having.

The national Web site for "Raise Your Voice" week describes the week as an opportunity for national student groups to speak in a collective voice promoting student civic engagement. Events are planned to excite students about involvement and these are organized on campuses around the country. These experiences have an intended result of activating a large number of students in the democratic process. The specific events might vary from campus to campus, though all will create opportunities for students to speak out about what is important to them.

Campus Compact especially hopes to reach those students who have never before participated in public life, but who have the desire to learn more about service learning, politics and civic engagement.

Janice Butler, the director for the new Office of Service-Learning is responsible for bringing "Raise Your Voice" week to the University.

Similar to Campus Compact, the Office of Service Learning "is trying to promote Bucknell student participation in this campaign," Butler said. "Most students, until they get to college, do not have a sense of the impact they can have on society."

The new director believes that, especially in today's world with the circumstances that we live in, more students need to become involved.

"In these times of uncertainty, when we consider what the future might hold in terms of war, what our country's relationship to other nations might be, what is happening to the environment, what to do about the ongoing problems of poverty and homelessness and other social challenges, it really is important for students to be involved, to work toward creating the future that they want," Butler said. "The national 'Raise Your Voice' campaign is an attempt to make students' efforts, ideas and achievements more visible. It's a great opportunity to network and show how youth are working together to make a difference in the causes that matter to them."

Gadhia has set up a Web page concentrating specifically on the "Raise Your Voice" week at the University. The Office of Service-Learning is looking for all students and organizations that want to help out to get involved.

According to the Web site, "Young people are frequently criticized for being disengaged or apolitical, but we know that students are volunteering at an all-time high rate." The are many possible events that organizations can set up with the Office of Service-Learning. The possibilities listed on the Web site include voter registration drives, a panel discussion with elected officials, a blood drive for a local hospital and a debate about free speech and civil liberties.

The "Raise Your Voice" campaign is intending to promote issues that are important to the youth of America because the youth of America are the ones participating in the events. Those is charge of the week feel it is extremely important that America's college students stop being observers and become more proactive.

Tuition

"In providing an exceptional education for our students, we spend a significant percentage of our budget on faculty and staff salaries, technology, facilities and financial aid, all factors that drive up our costs," Rogers said in the campus e-mail.

Some expenses that have put a strain on the budget are the new biomedical engineering major that will be introduced in the fall, the Hunt Hall ($3.8 million) and Vedder Hall ($3.3 million) renovations and the installation of "wireless" connections to the University's computer network in several buildings, including the library and the Langone Center.

"As more money becomes available in the long run, there is more we can do educationally," Marsh said.

There has also been an increase in institutional financial aid, from $28 to $30 million.

"We also continue to increase the size of our financial aid budget—primarily through endowed scholarships funded by generous donors—to ensure that we offer a learning environment conducive to high achievement and success for all of our students," Rogers said in the e-mail.

Another determining factor in the increase was the University's peer institutions, such as Lafayette, Lehigh and Villanova. According to Marsh, the Board of Trustees looked at the five-year average increase in the comprehensive fee for those schools and asked if the University wants to be at the bottom of the list and if the University underpricing. The board also asked how more revenue improve the institution in the long run.

Lehigh had a five-year average increase of 3.97 percent, Villanova had an increase of 4.98 percent and Lafayette had an increase of 4.27 percent. The University's increase was approximately 5 percent.

"We are more dependent on tuition, rather than investments, than many of the institutions we compare ourselves to," Marsh said.

The University is trying to hold down costs, according to Rogers.

> "We are more dependent on tuition, rather than investments, than many of the institutions we compare ourselves to."
> —Ben Marsh, professor of geography

"Departments throughout campus, excluding instructional areas, have been engaged in discussions on ways to trim their budgets without compromising the core mission of our institution. On the plus side, we are now realizing savings from the recent investment in our utilities infrastructure, which should result in a 10 percent cost reduction next year for heating and cooling," Rogers said in the e-mail.

Marsh admits that many faculty members and administrators think it would have been better for the University to have been increasing tuition over the past 10 years when the economy was strong so it would be working with a higher base tuition now. He would not be surprised if tuition continued to increase at a rate similar to the recent past, especially because of rising fixed costs at the University, such as computers.

"We can either continue to increase tuition at this rate or we can cut some of what we do now," Marsh said.

The Board of Trustees also decided to increase faculty and staff salaries. According to Marsh, the UPBC recommended a 3 percent increase for faculty and staff salaries, but the president recommended a 2.5 percent increase to the Board of Trustees.

"Last year the faculty got a very generous raise, and another sizable raise could probably be justified by the market. But in present economic and budget conditions, 2.5 percent is acceptable," Marsh said.

In the e-mail, Rogers said that he is proud of the University and the exceptional undergraduate experience it offers.

"We are committed to each and every student and will not do anything to compromise the trust they have placed in us," Roger said.

Irish author speaks at Campus Theatre

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Irish Author Don Mullan introduces the film based on his book "Eyewitness Bloody Sunday" at the Campus Theatre on Sunday.

the rights of the disenfranchised Irish Catholics: violence or non-violence. These protesters chose non-violence.

"We believed in the message of Gandhi and Martin Luther King," Mullan said.

He also mentioned that the Northern Ireland Civil Rights Movement was inspired by the Civil Rights movements in the United States.

"It was about changing a system that discriminated against Catholics who were deprived of fair employment and education and economic opportunities. It was about social transformation, creating a state that would value and respect all of its citizens," Mullan said.

After the deaths of 13 unarmed Irish protesters and the lies that circulated to justify the British Army's actions, peaceful resistance was no longer considered an option.

Violence was then perceived as the only means necessary for achieving equality.

"The effect of all those events put together was that a couple generations of people simply said there's no such thing as justice. Many young people made the transition from being peace activists to joining the IRA," Mullan said.

The British conducted an official inquiry of Bloody Sunday under Lord Chief Justice Lord Widgery.

"Within 10 weeks he not only had held the inquiry but he also issued his report. And basically he found the innocent guilt and the guilty innocent," Mullan said.

According to Mullan, the demonstrators committed their eyewitness accounts to paper immediately after the occurrence, but Widgery failed to examine many of them, and used only contradictory sources to discredit their claims.

The soldiers were never condemned of their actions and the victims' families did not receive justice, Mullan said.

Then in 1996, Mullan revisited these historical documents and wrote his book so that the truth could be told.

A few years later, British filmmakers Paul Greengrass and Mark Redhead approached Mullan about making a movie based on his book.

This film was shown after Mullan's lecture on Monday.

"I believe that if Prime Minister Edward Heath, back in 1972, and the Lord Chief Justice, Lord Widgery, had showed the same courage as these two filmmakers, then I don't believe the conflict would have been as prolonged and I don't believe over 3000 people would be dead today," Mullan said.

Mullan dedicated the viewing of the film to both his colleagues Greengrass and Redhead and also to the victims' families.

posed as the girl online, to meet at his University residence, police had enough information to make an arrest.

According to the Patriot News, at the intended meeting time, police "seized the suspect's computer and charged him with attempted statutory rape, unlawful communications with a minor and attempted corruption of a minor."

The case has been sent to Northumberland County Court.

Dean of Students Richard Ferraro said that it is the blurring line between the cyber world and the real world that helps to facilitate such actions.

"The cyber world is the real world and often we assume it's not," Ferraro said.

Many organizations concerned with the welfare of children, especially children using the Internet, publish lists of "dos and don'ts" on the Internet.

Some people feel that surfing the Web makes them untouchable and safe from any repercussions in the outside world.

The FBI publishes a pamphlet that is available online discussing how to keep children safe, what warning signs to look for and what contacts can be made to protect children from cyber crimes.

As a result of good, attentive parenting, a serious incident in the Goldberg case was prevented.

Educating children about the dangers of chat rooms and other online places can help reduce the number of sexually related Internet crimes.

Fraternity members of Sigma Alpha Epsilon earned an average GPA of 3.29, the highest average GPA rank for all male groups on campus. Fraternity members of Sigma Chi, Kappa Alpha Psi, Sigma Phi Epsilon and Chi Phi earned average GPAs of 3.28, 3.26, 3.23 and 3.22, respectively. Fraternity members of Kappa Delta Rho, Phi Kappa Psi, Lambda Chi Alpha and Delta Upsilon earned respective average GPAs of 3.18, 3.16, 3.06 and 3.05. Fraternity members of Phi Gamma Delta, Tau Kappa Epsilon, Kappa Sigma and Sigma Alpha Mu earned average GPAs of 3.04, 2.98, 2.96 and 2.75, respectively.

All women independent from a sorority earned an average GPA of 3.24 and all men independent from a fraternity earned an average GPA of 3.11.

Two hundred twelve University student-athletes earned Dean's List honors for the fall 2002 semester, 48 of whom earned perfect 4.0 GPAs.

To achieve the Dean's List honor, students must have a minimum GPA of 3.50.

Kevin Brown '06, a member of the track team, was named to the Dean's List for the fall 2002 semester.

"Being a student-athlete at Bucknell requires planning time for work more than the average student," Brown said. "Knowing that you will be spending 25 or more hours a week practicing and traveling to and from competitions requires good time management skills, and a level of flexibility at the same time in order to complete assignments on time."

> "My impression of student-athletes at Bucknell is that they generally perform very well academically. Certainly the number of academic all-Americans, which Bucknell can boast of is unusually large."

Ferraro commended student-athletes' academic achievements.

"My impression of student-athletes at Bucknell is that they generally perform very well academically. Certainly the number of academic all-Americans, which Bucknell can boast of is unusually large," Ferraro said. "And even though student-athletes have to spend a not inconsiderable amount of time on their sports, many times they have superb time management skills, so that they handle both academic and sporting obligations with relative ease."

Students don't need anymore restrictions

Associate Professor of Mathematics George Exner presented a motion which would formally regulate acceptable hours for special athletic practices during the day at the faculty meeting held Monday afternoon. In summary, the motion restricts team meetings organized by the coach or independently by the players that scheduled between 8 a.m. and 4 p.m ("class hours"). While the majority of the faculty dismissed the idea and the motion failed in a vote, Exner brings up a point that merits discussion.

By adding a scheduling restriction to athletic "meetings," an excessive regulation would be placed on a campus that is arguably too regulated. University students are, and should be, responsible for their own time. This excessive regulation insinuates that students are incapable of managing their own time and prioritizing their tasks. If a student has a scheduled practice with other athletes on the team, and if an academic obligation comes up, such as needing additional assistance in a class, it is the responsibility of the student to reschedule the practice or suspend all other priorities to meet a professor's schedule.

If a student is incapable of prioritizing his or her education, then he or she needs to learn the hard way (even if that means failing a class). Students should not need to have members of the faculty and administration scheduling their days. Imagine what would come next ... lunches with chaperones and mandatory campus curfews?

Fortunately, the majority of professors on campus are very flexible in arranging appointments or office hours. There may be exceptions or instances in which professors have set obligations that they are unable to work around, and in these cases especially, coaches should be expected to be equally flexible as professors.

Furthermore, professors often commit the same crime that Exner is trying to eliminate. Professors often require attendance to films and speakers scheduled outside of class hours, forcing students to miss their extracurricular activities. Although these activities may supplement class, they still infringe upon the student's personal time.

Another point to consider is that many students come to the University for sports in addition to academics. Even with the institution of merit aid for the Class of 2007, students are not admitted to this University unless they demonstrate superior academic ability. Students enter the University after being highly involved in extracurricular activities and sports at their high schools and would not be able to achieve this success without an inherent work ethic and the ability to effectively manage their time.

This is apparent from the recent statistics regarding the academic performance of students from last semester. With an average GPA of 3.26, the student body has demonstrated its ability to achieve academic excellence. Additionally, 212 out of approximately 800 student-athletes (25 percent) were named to the Dean's List, indicating that student-athletes are certainly capable of balancing their course work and their athletic responsibilities.

During the final exam period it is certainly acceptable to restrictions on students' personal lives (e.g. quiet hours), but for the preceding 14 weeks of the semester, this regulation is unnecessary.

Student questions author's sources

To the Editor:

I would like to thank Tom Elliott for his article entitled "Anti-drug commercials mislead public"—his ideas are as refreshing and original as "the new Coke."

Unfortunately, neither Mr. Elliott nor the new Coke is original or refreshing.

Perhaps since Mr. Elliott did not cite his own sources, or place quotation marks, for that matter, I will do it for him:

Rich Lowry, "ONDCP's anti-marijuana ad campaign"
http://www.townhall.com/columnists/richlowry/rl20030113.shtml
Brian Hindo, "Super Bowl Ads: Lots of Fumbles" http://www.businessweek.com/bwdaily/dnflash/jan2003/nf20030127_8643.htm
South Park, "My Future Self and Me," Season 6, Episode 16

Special thanks (on behalf of Tom Elliott) to conservative columnist Lowry for extensive phrases, paragraphs and key words such as "demagogy."

And Tom, the next time you are fishing for ideas on the Net, check out www.snopes.com (urban legend section), where, to my own chagrin, I found that the DEA billboard is a myth. And while you're at it, check out the University's Academic Responsibility page, or www.dictionary.com, type in "plagiarism" and press ENTER.

Wasted resources increase tuition

To the Editor:

As most people know, tuition has increased and many programs are being subjugated to cuts due to the economic distress of the country and of the University. I have noticed that one way that the University could certainly cut back on is the distribution of fliers, newspapers and other writings that are either unnecessary or provided in unnecessary quantities. For example, walking into downhill Langone Center, one sees the piles and stacks of Bucknell World, as well as unread Bucknellians. Walking into the mailbox section, one can also see the overflow of "junk" paper in the recycling bin (these may include Weis Center activities, Public Safety fliers, etc.). Of course, a simple solution in replacing "junk" mail and such is e-mail. Now, I think that it would be interesting, and also important, if The Bucknellian could feature an article about the tuition increase in relation to wasted resources. Or, if The Bucknellian could just make people aware that there are resources that could be gained from other places, rather than tuition increase and cutting back on other programs.

The Bush economic report card

By Mike Niebauer
Senior Writer

We are in the second half of the four-year experiment of taking random samples of human kindness out of the compassionate conservative presidency. It is time to chart its economic effects and effectiveness so far to see if we need to fire or rehire our nation's leadership. We may be really seeing a rerun of a really bad economic movie at this point.

Economically, the outlook is at best cloudy and volatile. This means that by the end of the first three weeks of January, all the early January stock market gains essentially evaporated. Surprisingly, this happened after U.S. President George W. Bush's long-awaited economic stimulus package has been presented and is found by many to be wanting. The opposition to this plan is coming even from Republican governors who are forced to raise taxes in their states to make up the lack of state aid from the president's proposal. Increased taxation in the states will negate what short-term stimulus there is in Bush's package.

The Democrats are having a political gift handed to them with the package. They can arguably state that it stimulates only the pocketbooks of the top 5 percent of earners at the expense of social programs. There are signs that this is happening to the social programs in the welfare-to-work program. Make work programs have been increased 10 hours per week for welfare recipients to earn their checks. When and how will they ever get off the program if they have no time to go to school or raise their children properly? The "No Child Left Behind" education proposal is underfunded. Also, few believe that the new Homeland Security Department will have adequate resources either. Even financial experts are beginning to believe we are in for a fourth year of a downturn in the stock market and a weakened economic outlook.

Doug Cliggott of Drummer and Partners said, "We may be in for two more years of lackluster performance in this economy if we do not tend to fundamentals and watch what is happening to the ballooning federal deficit and discretionary spending." Rising prices for oil and other commodities are working to dampen the economy. The White House war rhetoric is bothering markets and our traditional allies, France, Germany and now Russia, are unconvinced of the urgency of the Iraqi situation and want the inspections to continue. The White House is banking on a quick win against Iraq to boost the economic outlook.

Can the Bush supply-side economic policies work when capacity utilization in the economy is over 70 percent? Cliggott and others are filled with doubt that it can. In an atmosphere when all economic problems are answered with more tax cuts and little else, only inflationary pressures seem likely. The president inspires little fiscal confidence since he had to fire and replace the majority of his economic team and we are now in the process of approving his second economic stimulus plan because his first one didn't work out.

Another issue that is dogging the economy is the pervasive volatility in the stock market. With over 50 percent of working families having stock in their portfolios, the thoughts of the working class toward the market must be mentioned. Small investors are staying out market transactions and withdrawing from their mutual fund accounts. They are losing trust in markets since the corporate scandals of last summer. The few that have been fined were just given a light slap on the wrist and little or no jail time so far.

Many of the Enron criminals are still among us and living exceedingly well. People are not impressed with these disappointing developments, so they are smartly waiting and not participating. The only actors in the markets are the large investors (hedge funds and insurance companies, corporate entities, etc.). They are causing much of the market volatility because of the size of their moves in a stagnant economic market. This may explain the inability of the stock market to sustain any momentum. The dollar is weakening against the Euro in the currency markets as well.

If Cliggott is right, the president may join his father in an early presidential retirement. Next year at this time we will be looking forward to another presidential campaign. We can only hope that the president won't have to launch another economic stimulus package while he is running for re-election. Former Treasury Secretary O'Neill was given a "D" by the press recently. The judgement of the press in this case is sadly correct. The job formation and economic performance so far in the Bush presidency deserves the same grade.

Pickup lines 101: What's your major, baby?

By Andrea Dill
Chief Copy Editor

"What's your sign?" You hear that line and can just imagine the wink and nod from the sleazy guy who said it ... back in 1976. What's your sign is a shady cliché from the movies—people don't actually say that anymore, do they? The less sketchy but equally lame alternative to, "What's your sign?" for college students is, "What's your major?"

My majors are economics and English. Ask me a technical question about supply and demand or fiscal policy, and I am likely to at least recognize all of the words in your query, thanks to my eight mandatory economics classes. Alongside my economics major, I am an English major. It took me a year to declare though. After all, the shame of an English major is a heavy cross to bear.

People look at me incredulously when I divulge that I study all things economic. They are unable to conceive of the notion that somebody could find economics stimulating. Don't get me wrong—I have zero intention of becoming an economist—the classes, however, are interesting. Economics is a solid major. When word of my English major comes to light though, people scoff. English, they seem to imply, is a lightweight major; it is practically a joke. They ignore the hundreds of pages of reading, the literary analysis and the hours spent writing papers that go into being an English major, to say, "What are you going to do with that?"

Is there is a major immune to mocking? There used to be prestige in a premed major. The thought of HMOs now gives doctors a bad name. Despite the valiant efforts of upstanding attorneys on television, there are way too many lawyer jokes out there to prevent prelaw majors from being associated with injustice, lying and crooked dealings. Accounting majors have to be anal retentive and boring, but at least there are job openings now that their prospective colleagues are headed for jail. Eventually, crooked business majors who have risen through the executive ranks will accompany them in the slammer. Engineering majors all own pocket protectors and will end up becoming well-paid dorks. Artists and poets will starve should they stick to their majors, right? People associate majors with various stereotypes, and they feel the need to tell you what they think.

Without embarrassment, people are vocal about how frivolous, boring, pointless and ultimately worthless any given major is. I wonder what major someone can have without being heckled. My friend the linguistics major thinks economics is a waste of time; I am selling out, you see. A woman shocked another friend of mine when she asserted that he could do a lot of things with his international relations major. This strange lady is the only person in his life who has had a positive reaction to his major. My sister graduated from Princeton University and everybody succumbed to the temptation of asking her, "What are you going to do with a degree in history?" A secretary in the history department assured her that many graduates of Princeton with a history degree have done well. Bill Ford, Harvey Firestone and Dean Cain are all examples. Lacking a double major in nepotism or the ability to pull off Superman in tights and a cape, my sister now works in translation.

Statistics show that your major usually has little or nothing to do with where you will ultimately end up in the job market. It is some consolation for people who declared a major based on what was the lesser evil or because it was the only subject for which they could stomach the required number of courses. It seems, increasingly, that your major is not a means to an employment end. Instead, your major is the launch pad in a series of leapfrogs from job to job. Back in the olden days, people often got a job right out of school and stayed with that company until retirement. Nowadays, it seems that kids do not know what they want to do with the rest of their lives. That is perfectly acceptable though, for it is now the norm for people to have many jobs and work at a few companies over their lifetimes.

As a senior, the question people ask me has shifted to, "What are you going to do when you graduate?" This line is no less lame, but is a little bit scarier because the answer seems more important. Graduation is the big time. At least I have an answer as to my astrological sign (Leo) and major (economics and English)—but as for my future? Time will tell. People play the "What are you going to do with your life?" question fast and loose like it's a "What's your sign?" type of pickup line. It's not. At the same time, the shifting job market seems to provide some hope and solace for the undecided among us.

Perhaps decreased job security at a single firm over your lifetime comes with increased freedom to go after whatever jobs you desire. Perhaps with no set employment goals, you can change your mind and decide that the course on the history of Pig Latin was your true calling. I certainly do not know what I want to do upon hitting the "real world," but I am thinking about it now that I am in my fourth year of college without an option on a fifth. Whatever joking answer I give to the life's work inquiry, at least it is not declared like my majors or fixed like my astrological sign. Meanwhile, if you have any ideas for what I should do when I grow up, please let me know.

University priorities misplaced

Justification for tuition increase lacks logic and persuasion

By Josh Fisher
Opinions Editor

"Bucknell provides an exceptional education to the exceptional students who enroll here," President Steffen Rogers said in his latest campus e-mail, which contained a subtle notification of the upcoming tuition hike as well as a thinly-veiled rationalization for the University's current financial woes.

The University's educational experience is so exceptional (apparently) that to the average student it is worth roughly $35,262. Next year University students will have the extra pleasure of paying 5 percent more—and 5 percent more after that, and 5 percent more. In fact, for the next seven years, the University Planning and Budget Committee's (UPBC) plan calls for 5 percent tuition increases. The comprehensive fee for attending this university will be just about $40,000 per year by the time Vision 2010 comes to fruition.

Oh, there is no question that the University does amazing things with an annual budget of $179 million, 60 percent of which (a controlling share) comes from student tuition.

But wait! There's more! Along with this once in a lifetime opportunity you will get free "wireless" connectivity to the network, renovations in Hunt Hall, Coleman Hall and Bostwick Cafeteria, complete with those little conveyer-belt thingies so you don't even have to see the employees cleaning up after you—the dishes go in dirty and magically come out clean!

The University's ploy in Rogers' "2003-2004 Comprehensive Fee" e-mail is quite simple: Students will abide the tuition hike in exchange for receiving more services and more of those much sought after conveniences from the University.

The burning question remains: What are we paying such an inordinate amount for? Are we paying to entertain the Board of Trustees in New York for the weekend?

Do not be fooled; this tuition hike will not result in the services and/or conveniences that you may think; in fact, the "wireless" network components Rogers mentioned were purchased nearly two years ago.

You may not know it, but the University is actually trying to cover a $2.1 million deficit from this operating year, thanks to poor endowment performance coupled with the razor-sharp intellect and financial wizardry of the administration's higher-ups, who originally failed to account for windows and maintenance costs in the Sojka Pavilion ... cough (former Vice President of Finance Jo-Anne Lema, who was released when she could not answer basic questions about the University's financial situation at a recent Board of Trustees meeting).

Oh, there is no question that the University does amazing things with an annual budget of $179 million, 60 percent of which (a controlling share) comes from student tuition. Take a look at that sports-oriented eyesore of a juice bar, with a projected total project cost of $64 million—now tell me that your tuition, perhaps a drop in the bucket considering the University's grander finances, is spent appropriately.

Oh and we all know that the Sojka Palace ... I mean the Sojka Pavilion ... is going to dramatically increase the exceptionality of our collective educational experience.

But all is fine and good since the University will concurrently (but perhaps unequally) increase the financial aid budget, right? On the contrary, from my experience. When Rogers so solemnly broke the news about last year's 8 percent tuition hike, my scholarship dropped by $5,000! And so currently I am still indebted to the University (financially).

The part I find particularly interesting in Rogers' e-mail mentions that "we spend a significant percentage of our budget on faculty and staff salaries ... factors that drive up our costs." Rogers so conveniently omits any mention of the budget for administrative salaries (including his own) which matches the budget for faculty salaries—$17 million.

Alas, finally I will be able to sleep soundly knowing that the administration is well taken care of.

Granted, $35,000 is a worthwhile expenditure for an exceptional education, but not when students and the University are more concerned with "conveniences" than being well-read, giving education itself short shrift.

The burning question remains: What are we paying such an inordinate amount for?

Are we paying to entertain the Board of Trustees in New York for the weekend?

Are we paying for the University to spit polish and market its pseudo-"Ivy League" image?

Are we paying for all the conveniences of a country club university?

Or are we paying for an education that (for some) is no more meaningful than a "B.A." or "B.S." written on a diploma, one that could be more inexpensively obtained with a public library card?

"Dubyanomics" replaces compassion

By Mike Niebauer
Senior Writer

Now that we are in year three of the era of "compassionate conservatism," the social program proposals are beginning to take the onerous shape of some of those from the Reagan years. One of the most remarkable events of those years was when Reagan was cutting the school-lunch program and they actually tried to have ketchup classified as a vegetable as a cost saving measure. Another real howler was during the first Reagan election campaign. Reagan made an eloquent speech about a fictitious "welfare queen" to rally support against public assistance programs for the poor just for the votes.

The press and other Reagan-era skeptics labeled this strategic speech on economics and Reagan's restrictive remedies "Reaganomics." Most of these proposals worked to generally undermine the social safety net of the needy. Reagan's scaling back of programs eventually paved the way for results like 40 people million without health care and the new descriptive term, "the working poor." It seems we are in for an updated version called "Dubyanomics." U.S. News and World Report was first to use the term describing the emerging Bush administration economic policy. Sadly, it looks to be accurate.

It seems that U.S. President George W. Bush's economic policy refuses to pay for expanding expenditures with tax increases. With the expansion of the projected deficit, a new expensive Homeland Security Cabinet-level department and an expected war and occupation underway within weeks, we have had no mention from the president of how to pay for these initiatives. The Federal Reserve is nearly out of room for interest-rate cuts, and corporations have no ability to increase their profits since consumers are now slowing their spending habits. It seems Bush will balance the administration's reluctance to face economic reality on the backs of the working poor and disabled.

New Medicare proposals from the White House would give more discretion to states to reduce, eliminate or (laughingly unbelievable) increase Medicare benefits for millions of low-income people. These will also include many elderly and disabled people who have little or no possible alternatives. The new rules will effect two-thirds of Medicare spending and one-third of Medicaid spending that affects the poorest. With states in debt from the prolonged economic doldrums, they are looking at massive reductions from the federal government over the next 10 years.

This is bad news for the most vulnerable during an economic downturn. Poor states will cut their benefits the most and states that choose to maintain funding levels will become recipient magnets in many cases. There is little possibility that states will increase or enhance benefits since they constitutionally have to balance their budgets. The millions of newly designated "optional beneficiaries" are the most vulnerable recipients in the system.

Where are the cuts in corporate welfare programs? Where are the cuts in the Star Wars missile defense research program? When will someone propose a minimum wage increase for struggling workers? Compassionate conservatism must have been replaced.

I'm sorry, I forgot that under "Dubynomics" "compassionate conservatism" must have been "downsized," then laid off. "Dubyanomics" has taken over and opened an offshore tax account in Bermuda to avoid paying taxes. It's good for business. The poor are not impressed. I hope they vote their pocketbooks next year.

Political labels distort reality

By Nicole Wiederspiel
Writer

Every time I hear the phrase "liberal bias," and hear specifically, that the University suffers from this disease, I am reminded that the word "liberal" has become so distorted, so in need of a historical context, that I can say for certain I don't have a clue what the word means anymore. I have a feeling I am not alone.

So how does one define a liberal, a conservative, a radical or a reactionary, anyway? It seems that yet another consequence of these postmodern times is our inability to clearly define our own constructed paradigms, or to define what is simply beyond definition.

So how does one define a liberal, a conservative, a radical or a reactionary, anyway?

I am not even going to even try to provide a dichotomy of what I perceive these words to mean. However, I think it is important that we re-examine our perceptions and misconceptions before we begin to label each other with these limited phrases that are loaded with historical, cultural and social baggage.

When thinking about our so-called "liberal bias," I am reminded of a folk song from the '60s by Phil Ochs (a personal favorite), entitled "Love me, I'm a Liberal," in which Ochs, a powerful voice of '60s protest, mocks American "liberals." While the lyrics are dated (mostly with references to the Civil Rights Movement), the song discusses ambivalence and hypocrisy, characteristics that he felt captured liberals of the 1960s, with their tendency towards embracing minorities ("as long as they don't move next door"), to not talking about revolution ("that's going a little bit too far") and their tendency to sway "10 degrees to the left of center in good times" and "10 degrees to the right of center if it affects them personally."

Upon hearing this song, I began to realize that times unfortunately haven't changed too much. The number of actual progressives on this campus (radicals, if you will) is quite small, and while many faculty members are undeniably more towards the left on the political spectrum, asserting that the University's policies are dominated by the so-called "liberal" faculty, is faulty to say the least.

Hopefully I don't need to tell you that University President Steffen Rogers and the Board of Trustees wield a considerable amount of power and influence, and theirs is a whitewashed politics of ambiguous moderation, lip service to the political-correctness "movement" and a flagrant disregard for social justice masked by condescending charity.

Then there's the student population. There are not many self-proclaimed revolutionaries and social activists walking around campus—and the minority of those who are are overextended, stressed and disillusioned with the dismal political situation are desperately trying not to surrender to the massive tides of ambivalence.

I mean, how many students are willing to demonstrate in Washington D.C., and protest something, be it the impending war with Iraq, the appalling amount of poverty on a global scale or the rights of the SUV driver?

I have been affected by this ambivalence all too much—as social outreach director of a campus organization, I unsuccessfully attempted to organize a food fast to raise awareness and funds in regards to world hunger. I was evidently "going too far."

However, I think it is important that we re-examine our perceptions and misconceptions before we begin to label each other with these limited phrases that are loaded with historical, cultural and social baggage.

The progressive voice on this campus is growing, yet still painfully small. But to assert that a "liberal bias," that is to say, a progressive bias, pervades this campus is an erroneous assumption.

The University is still overwhelmingly a place in which a murky, self-serving conservatism reigns, and the denial of this fact is disconcerting.

A new and improved GOP?

An opportunity for Republicans to match policy to rhetoric

By Peter Hackeman
Opinions Editor

In a recent interview with The Hill, Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., announced that Senate Republicans have a plan to attract minority voters to support the GOP. When probed for the reasons behind the current outreach to minorities, and African Americans in particular, Santorum admitted that repairing the image problems the GOP suffered during the scandal surrounding Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., and a general need to win a larger percentage of the African American vote were the two main motivations. It is not surprising to see an elected official cater to a specific voting group and it's not disturbing for me to see him do so in a very open and public way.

I have no problem with Santorum admitting that he is going to lead the GOP in an effort to win the hearts, minds and particularly votes of some of our nation's African Americans. In fact, I applaud him for trying to do so and for being so up front about why he is trying. It's those reasons that make it so unfortunate that he and many of his GOP colleagues are planning this outreach in the way they are.

The very key to their plan is simple: Keep the same policies the Republican Party has advocated since the 1960s, but change the way they sell themselves to minorities. Ever since the "Southern Strategy" became something near gospel for the GOP, they've found themselves getting support from the African American community in the pathetically low level of single digits.

Based on this, Santorum has a unique opportunity to be a true leader in our government. He can decide that as he reaches out to African Americans with words and symbols, he is also going to reach out with his votes.

For the past 30 or so years, that was still enough to win national elections and to keep near a respectable number of the seats in the Congress.

The "Southern Strategy" worked because Republicans running for Senate in Illinois, Michigan, Minnesota, New York, Maine and even Pennsylvania ran very different campaigns than those Republicans running in Mississippi, Texas, Alabama and other southern states. Republicans running for national office made sure to appeal to the less than racially tolerant voters in the South without offending the tolerant suburban swing voters in the Northeast and Upper Midwest.

Leaving a debate about the honesty and morality of this strategy to another place and time, the important fact about the current approach is that Republicans realize that the changing demographics of our country are rendering this strategy obsolete. Unfortunately, instead of altering their policy positions to fit the new image of the GOP, Republicans are only changing the window dressing of their party. The policies that have evolved during the past years will now be changed in name only.

Aside from some symbolic attempts by President George W. Bush to lure minorities back to the party of Lincoln, the Republicans are still the party of Jerry Falwell, Pat Robertson, David Duke, Trent Lott and company. While there are elements seeking to change the wayward policies of the party, like Sens. Snow and Collins of Maine and Sen. Lincoln Chaffee, R.I., the party leadership and the majority of the rank and file members want to have their anti-minority cake and eat it too.

A cursory glance at this session's Senate controversy serves as a perfect illustration. When Lott became embroiled in the controversy surrounding his comments about former Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., the leading contenders to succeed him as Senate Republican leader were Sen. Bill Frist, R-Tenn., Sen, Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., Sen. Don Nickles, R-Okla., and Santorum. All five of these men received ratings of "F" from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). While the NAACP might not be the absolute authority on issues of importance to minorities in this country, it is still the leading organization devoted to the legislative issues of African Americans. The simple fact that the current and potential leaders of the GOP in the Senate all got the worst rating is illustrative.

I often dislike simplistic ratings for representatives and senators, so I took a look at the votes the NAACP used to rate the senators. The results, obtained from the Library of Congress's Web page www.thomas.loc.gov, were more appalling than I anticipated.

For example, Santorum voted with the NAACP 18 percent of the time, which amounts to three votes in the NAACP's important issues listing. However, these votes were no-brainers, or "throwaway" votes as they are sometimes called. He voted in favor of an amendment that supported the civil rights of American Muslims and condemned acts of violence against Arab-Americans after Sept. 11; he supported changing the name of an election reform bill to the Martin Luther King Jr. Equal Protection of Voting Rights Act of 2001; and he voted for final passage of the aforementioned bill. These were hardly acts of courage and conviction; the three votes were 98-0, 97-0 and 99-1.

On the votes where there was any doubt about the outcome, Santorum showed his true colors. He voted, in Senate vote 91, against full funding for providing aid to public schools that serve poor and disadvantaged children. He voted, in Senate vote 100, against money for bilingual education. He voted, in Senate vote 180, against "requiring states to provide essentially the same services to schools in low-income neighborhoods that they offer to schools in wealthier areas," according to NAACP.org. And in the most outrageous example, he tried to kill the very same Martin Luther King Jr. Equal Protection of Voting Rights Act that he made such a show of supporting in the earlier mentioned votes. Santorum voted, in Senate vote 40, against ending debate so that a vote on the bill's passage could be taken. Again, all of these votes are on the public record, available from the Library of Congress.

Based on this, Santorum has a unique opportunity to be a true leader in our government. He can decide that as he reaches out to African Americans with words and symbols, he is also going to reach out with his votes. He, as a member of the leadership team, can show his fellow Republicans in the Senate that governing is still about actions, not wholly about rhetoric. He can make a great name for this state by being a leader in the Republicans movement toward a more inclusive party.

If the GOP intends to receive a higher percentage of votes from ethnic minorities in this country, it should try to earn them instead of misleading voters. I have faith that eventually the Republicans will do this. With the shifting political winds making the African American and Hispanic vote more and more vital to electoral success, the GOP will have no choice but to adjust its policies to fit the views of all Americans, not just conservative, white Southerners.

Spring considers running for Senate in 2004

By Lindsey Gentel
Staff Writer

Jerry Springer is showing that he is more than simply the host of one of America's favorite television talk shows. The Democratic talk show host was once a campaign aide to Sen. Robert Kennedy, D-Mass., and was elected to the Cincinnati mayor's office. He has also won five Emmys as a television newsman. Could a run for the U.S. Senate be next on Springer's agenda?

Springer has said he will decide by the summer whether to challenge Sen. George Voinovich, R-Ohio, for the Senate in 2004.

The man who changed the face of daytime television may face his biggest obstacle from his own party. Several of his fellow Democrats have spoken publicly about the questionable nature of Springer as a serious candidate.

"Springer wouldn't be my first choice for Senate. I understand he was a mayor at one point, but I think we can do a lot better than that, and I'm sure Ohio will," said Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., according to CNN.com.

> "And if no one else is going to run and represent the point of view [of millions of people], then I'll do it."
> —Jerry Springer

Springer remains optimistic, emphasizing that he is considering the possibility of running due to the lack of support he feels people receive from the government.

"I don't need the job. I'm happy where I am. I have a good life. Being a United States senator isn't going to make me rich. It isn't going to make me famous," said Springer on "Crossfire." "I honestly care about certain things. And if no one else is going to run and represent the point of view [of millions of people], then I'll do it. That's the point."

If Springer does run, his campaign must rely heavily on emphasizing that he can be taken seriously as an elected official. Making a living off a show with topics such as, "My Boyfriend is a Girl," "Your Lover is Mine," "Mistresses Attack!" "My Brother is my Lover!" and so on, could cast some serious doubt on the possibility of voters seeing Springer as a genuine candidate.

"This isn't about a reward for Jerry Springer. Who the hell cares whether Jerry Springer gets a job or not? That isn't about me. Our country is in trouble. And there are people that think our politics is a bunch of crap, to be honest. They don't think the government relates to them at all," Springer said on "Crossfire."

Some critics see the attack on Springer as extremely unfair and rather elitist. They argue that dismissing him as a legitimate candidate simply by how he currently earns his living is completely undemocratic.

Regardless of the issues surrounding his qualities as a senator, Springer emphasized that the voters should simply decide for themselves.

"[If I'm not a qualified candidate], it's going to be so obvious during the course of the campaign. But I am prepared to discuss the issues as they relate to the people of Ohio. They're going to judge. That's what this whole system is about," Springer said on "Crossfire."

Angry rioters protest in Ivory Coast

At least 100,000 protesters gather in Abidjan, Ivory Coast to demonstrate against a French-brokered peace accord and French President Jacques Chirac. The sign reads, "Chirac! Chirac! Whatever you do the last word belongs to the people." The peace accord was aimed at ending a four-month civil war in Ivory Coast.

Citizens of the Ivory Coast stormed the streets of Abidjan by the tens of thousands last Saturday and Sunday to challenge the French-brokered peace accord aimed at ending the four-month civil war in this war-torn African country. The demonstrations were the largest in the country since a failed coup attempt forced Ivory Coast, the world's largest cocoa producer, into ethnic conflict.

On Sunday, stone-throwing mobs attacked the French embassy and army base in Abidjan. French soldiers used tear gas, stun grenades and water cannons to drive away the demonstrators. According to CNN.com, protesters had besieged French buildings across Abidjan, the commercial capital of 3 million inhabitants, and destroyed the French cultural center and two French schools. A main shopping center and a private radio station were also ransacked. Homes and businesses owned by foreigners, including French, Lebanese and North Africans, had also been targets of the mob violence.

According to CNN.com, French President Jacques Chirac said of the violence, "It is extremism that I condemn, and that President Gbagbo [of Ivory Coast] has condemned. The French government has taken a number of military measures to make sure that French and other foreign interests in Abidjan are protected."

The New York Times reported that the peace accord, negotiated during talks in Marcoussis, France, envisions a "government of reconciliation," in which Gbagbo's elected government and the rebels who attempted to oust him would share power. The new government would be led by an interim prime minister until new elections are held. Gbagbo would remain as president until his term ends in 2005.

Gbagbo's supporters are reluctant to relinquish any measure of governing authority to the rebels. Gbagbo has yet to say whether he plans to follow the conditions of the peace deal, though he has called some parts of the accord "proposals," according to The New York Times.

"There are two ways to end a conflict. Either you win the war or submit to negotiation and compromise. I did not win the war," Gbagbo said to the Associated Press.

The protesters, whose numbers were estimated at 100,000-300,000, directed their wrath at France, Ivory Coast's former colonial ruler, which mediated the peace negotiations. They blamed the French government with forcing their president into an unattractive peace deal, which, in their opinion, favors the rebels. The protesters claimed that the rebels have been offered defense and interior ministry portfolios.

U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan dismissed accusations that France pushed Gbagbo to sign the agreement.

"This is an agreement negotiated by the Ivorian parties. ... The agreement and peace cannot be imposed," Annan said at a West African summit in Paris, according to The Washington Post.

While waving American flags and listening to American pop music, the crowd also appealed to the United States to intervene on its behalf.

According to The New York Times and The Washington Post, Charles Ble Goude, the leader of the Young Patriots, an umbrella group that organized the rally, said, "I want the United States to come and help my country, which is being destroyed by the right wing of the French government ... France has disappointed us. They gave power to people who took up arms against Ivory Coast. They have opened Pandora's box."

Unfortunately for the deal's opponents, the Bush administration has expressed its approval for the peace accord.

The Washington Post reported that West African leaders, worried that the violent insurgency might cause another full-fledged war in the region, also welcomed the fragile peace deal. They also pledged to create a committee to oversee its implementation and urged the United Nations to send military and civilian observers. French troops and regional forces already assembled in Ivory Coast would assume the role of supervisor of the rebel disarmament.

The peace accord also provides for amnesty for rebel soldiers and an international commission to investigate supposed human rights abuses. Delegates at the peace summit agreed to nominate Seydou Diarra, a career diplomat who served as prime minister in a previous national unity government, as interim prime minister.

SEC to benefit from President's new budget

President Bush delivers his State of the Union Address and discusses budget issues. He plans to substantially increase the SEC's funding.

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

While the nation steams towards a possible war with Iraq, domestic issues remain on the minds of many Americans. As the State of the Union Address suggested, the domestic agenda of this administration may remain in the forefront even if the media coverage of the conflict with Iraq takes center stage.

Earlier this week, President George W. Bush released his fiscal 2004 budget, a document that promises a 4 percent increase in federal spending, up to $2.2 trillion. Revenues are projected at $1.9 trillion and the president acknowledges that there will be larger deficits in the coming years; he maintains that the deficit will only be slightly more than 2.7 percent of the gross domestic product.

There is one number on the minds of Wall Street that may not be getting the same press as other portions of the budget. The Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), the regulatory agency long blamed for lapses leading to events like the collapse of Ehron, is getting a substantial boost from the 2004 budget. This boost, if it were passed, would place the commission as one of the few agencies getting significant spending increases.

According to a recent report in The New York Times, the "White House said it would seek a budget of $842 million for the year beginning Oct. 1, or 92 percent above what Congress appropriated last year."

"Officials also say that operations throughout the agency have been plagued by outdated computer technology, and, until last year, by professional pay scales that significantly lagged behind other financial regulatory agencies, leading to defections from the SEC. The agency's budget for the current year, like the rest of the federal government's budget, has not been settled by Congress," The New York Times reported.

The Wall Street Journal detailed some of the plans the agency has for the money the federal government is going to provide.

"The agency is planning to use the additional money to increase its staff by 505 employees—at a total cost of about $98.9 million. The budget would also give 3 percent pay raises to employees, at a cost of about $9.4 million, and $28 million would be available for 'merit raises.'"

"SEC officials have long insisted that they needed to offer higher wages and bonuses to prevent experienced employees from leaving for higher-paying jobs in the private sector or elsewhere in the government," according to The Wall Street Journal.

"Under the proposed budget, the investment-management regulation division, which polices areas such as investment companies and mutual funds, would get an additional 153 staffers. The SEC's enforcement division would see its funding rise 13 percent, from $370 million this year to $422 million in 2004, allowing it to hire an additional 151 attorneys and accountants," reported The Wall Street Journal.

The SEC is in a very strange position within the government. Budget increases for its programs are being looked at positively by members of both parties, largely due to the increase in corporate scandal over the past several years. All politicians are eager to see a commission with bigger teeth that can police the happenings of the securities markets to protect not only individual investors, but also corporations. If anything, there is the possibility that some may see the budgetary increases for the SEC as lacking in dollar amount. Some may ask for more money to fight corporate crime.

The president's budget is under heavy fire from all sides, especially from Democrats. Many Republicans have doubts about significant portions of the budget and there will likely be much debate about it in the coming months. The major sticking points appear to be homeland security, Medicare, the tax cuts and the deficits that will be required to sustain this level of spending.

Senate Budget Committee Chairman Don Nickles, R-Okla., called Bush's budget "an excellent starting point" in The Los Angeles Times, "and expressed hope Congress would hold total discretionary spending increases to 4 percent as Bush is requesting."

Other Republicans suggested that might not be politically possible.

According to The Los Angeles Times, Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley, R-Iowa, said that the budget "charts a straightforward course for peace and prosperity for America."

However, Grassley voiced his reservations about the Bush Medicare proposal and tax cuts. He feels that the tax cut legislation will have little to no chance of passing through the Senate as it is currently written.

Democrats are coming out with harsher views, The Los Angeles Times reported.

"Congressional Democrats assailed the president for running up the deficit to historic levels, with no concrete plan for bringing the government's books back into balance."

"In the face of the worst fiscal reversal in U.S. history and a declining economy, the administration's only response is to propose more of the same failed policies," said Sen. Kent Conrad, D-S.D., ranking Democrat on the Senate Budget Committee, according to The Los Angeles Times.

"This budget is a rip-off for the rich that starves our schools, health care and even homeland security," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., in The Los Angeles Times.

What happens with the Bush budget remains to be seen. The SEC is likely to get most of its funding, given the politics surrounding the federal budgeting process. The government will be able to say more about the commission's role in policing the markets and keeping corporate crime to a minimum.

Bucknell Remembers

When the Challenger exploded on Jan. 28, 1986, some University students were in their first year of elementary school and others were just starting preschool. Faculty members were at different stages in their lives, some pursuing their undergraduate degree and others obtaining their graduate degree. Seventeen years later, members of the University community experienced a similar tragedy, the Columbia breaking up over Texas. The Bucknellian asked faculty and students to reflect on their memories about the Challenger and Columbia explosions.

The crew of the Space Shuttle Columbia on Dec. 20, 2002 (left to right): Mission Commander Rick Husband, Pilot William McCool, Payload Specialist Ilan Ramon (the first Israeli astronaut), Mission Specialist David Brown, Payload Commander Michael Anderson, Mission Specialist Laurel Clark and Kalpana Chawla. The shuttle planned to arrive at the Kennedy Space Center at 9:16 a.m. EST on Feb. 3, 2003, but NASA officials lost contact with the orbiter. Texas residents reported seeing an explosion in the sky that was later confirmed to be the Space Shuttle Columbia.

I woke up Saturday around noon and logged on to my computer and check MSNBC.com to see if anything was happening. I saw the headlines "Space Shuttle Explosion." I immediately ran to my television and watched the rest on the news. My first reaction was no way this could happen; I mean space shuttles don't just explode anymore. Being an engineer and knowing how much testing and work goes into making sure something as important as the space shuttle, made me wonder how could this happen. I felt kind of numb for a while, wanting to know more answers and reasons on how could this happen. So I pretty much glued myself to the television and watched as much as I could about it.

I recall [the Challenger explosion] so clearly—I had been fascinated by the idea of sending a teacher into space program because as a kid I had wanted to be either an archaeologist or an astronaut. I had scrapbooks of every moonshot. I fretted through every moment of Apollo 13. In 1986, I was in graduate school. I had a beautiful little office with a beautiful view of the old campus. When I heard about Challenger I stared out that window for hours trying to deal with what then was the unimaginable. That view is frozen into a corner of my mind and it came back to me in all of its detail on Saturday morning.

I had just awoken and was listening to NPR. They said that Columbia was due to land in 13 minutes. The terrified flyer in me thought that; I wished they wouldn't tell me things like that, I'd rather know after they land. It's strange to think now that they were already gone at that moment.

When Challenger exploded I was an undergraduate at Williams College. The TV room in my dorm was in the basement, just across from the laundry room. I was doing laundry that day and saw an unusually large crowd gathered around the TV. Many people standing. I remember watching the video again and again. Because the program was still young, and because I was young, I remember thinking maybe this would put an end to the idea of a reusable, winged spacecraft. I also remember feeling the futility and impotence of a failed liftoff—not the shock and utter letdown of a failed homecoming.

I read about Columbia on The New York Times Web Site. It was just a headline because there was no information in yet, and the headline said something like "contact lost." I thought perhaps this could be the beginnings of a great action movie with the astronauts performing heroic feats of interstellar prowess to re-establish contact and land the spaceship safely. An hour later, when I turned on the television, I thought differently. I had returned from a trip the night before, and during my airtravel I remember remarking on the beautiful view of the tops of clouds. I thought of something I had discussed with my class last term: that modern man really has seen it all when he can see the tops of clouds; what was once a lid keeping us from the heavens was now just another element in the sky. We live amidst an epidemic of seeing. It was all so beautiful to look at. Accidents like Columbia call me back from this dream of the omnipotence of man gained through science, and they remind me of the perils of seeing too much.

I was working in a lab at Haverford (as part of my graduate work) when someone ran in and told us to turn on the television. I have to say that I was devastated by the Challenger explosion. My first reaction: "Oh my, isn't the teacher on this flight?" And, "There are seven people on the shuttle, what happened to them?"

But it is more than that—I grew up as a big fan of the space program (I was obsessive about it as a kid), gave tours at the National Air and Space Museum as a teen-ager (as part of the tours, I'd explain the shuttle and how it was going to work) and was very excited about the beginning of the shuttle program in 1980/1981. But the Challenger explosion was particularly poignant because some friends and I drove down to Florida and saw the first launching of the Challenger from the Kennedy Space Center complex. (This is amazing—if you ever get a chance to see a launch, it is incredible.) So, when I was watching the repeats of the explosion in 1986 (several hundred times), I kept wondering what I would have done had this happened the time I was down there watching.

My reaction was quite different this time—of course, there is the shock and sadness. But it wasn't quite the same thing as Challenger, because it wasn't the first time that I had gone through this. And I've always been amazed that they can get the thing back through the atmosphere—the maneuvers that the shuttle does are really incredible during re-entry. Frankly, it seemed almost inevitable that something like this would happen someday. And I think that another difference is that this disaster comes only a year after watching the WTC towers collapse killing 3,000 people, not to mention all the school shootings in the past few years. The Challenger accident stood out much more in 1986 because there weren't so many other horrible things going on at the time.

I heard about the Columbia's explosion sometime Saturday evening. I was busy Saturday during the day and I was shocked when one of my friends brought up the explosion.

Over the past couple of days I have attentively read all of The New York Times articles pertaining to this event. This is a tragic event not only for the astronauts and their families, but for our nation as a whole. I am curious to see what evidence will surface over the next few weeks explaining why this space shuttle exploded.

I was working a grad school job as a doorman at an apartment building on the South Side of Chicago [when I found out the Challenger exploded]. I picked up bits and pieces of news from residents as they walked through, and finally, one of them brought me a radio so I could listen to the news updates. It was weird because all my friends saw it on TV, but I only heard about it on the radio—and our feelings were very different. I was thinking about how sad the loss was, especially of Christa McAuliffe, the teacher onboard, while my friends were more shocked and fascinated by the images of the explosion itself.

Last Saturday I was working in my office at the back of Rooke Chapel when I turned on the radio and heard the news right when they first announced that the Columbia was not responding to communications and hadn't landed in Florida. I found myself almost surprisingly saddened and almost overcome. I guess you think you've seen it all, especially after Sept. 11, 2001, and that you can't be moved by anything anymore. And then you see the videotape of the faces of the astronauts and hear their enthusiasm; or you see the parents of an astronaut who have just been told he won't be coming back—and the sense of great hopes dashed and good people lost still gets to you. It seems there's so little in today's world that isn't somehow compromised—but certainly the motivation of the seven people to serve science and explore space seemed pure.

I saw the TV say breaking news, so I stopped to see what happened. Then I finally asked another student and she told me that Columbia had exploded, and I was shocked. It just didn't seem possible that it could happen again. And after the events of Sept. 11, the first thing I thought was that it must have been terrorist related. Then as more information came out about the tragedy and the terrorist fears were dispelled, but the great loss of Americans will always be in our minds.

When the Challenger exploded I was in kindergarten. I remember that we were all crying because we were sad that there was a teacher on board. Even as 5-year-olds we could relate to it because it made us think of our teacher ...

I just kept thinking that the Columbia explosion was such a terrible thing to have happen, especially since it was many of the astronauts' first trip. It definitely brought back sad memories of the Challenger.

I think I was in first grade and I remember my teacher telling the class about the Challenger explosion and we had a schoolwide assembly where we saw the news footage of the explosion and the principal gave us a speech.

Last Saturday I was getting into my car to drive to the Bison and I heard on the radio that a space shuttle exploded on its way back into Earth's atmosphere. After I got my food to go, I came home and sat in front of the TV watching CNN for most of the day trying to put all the pieces together. I could not believe that a space shuttle exploded; it made me realize how much I take space travel for granted now since I have not watched nor thought about watching a shuttle take off or land since I was about 10.

My first memory of the Challenger is when I was in elementary school. I was in the library, looking at photos on the wall, and I saw some of the smoke trail left by the shuttle just after it took off. I remember asking the librarian what they were. I probably had heard of the Challenger before then, but that moment is the first concrete memory that I have of it.

I found out about the Columbia on the afternoon of the 1st. I was in my room, procrastinating doing my work by reading some things online. I went to CNN's page, and I saw all of the articles about the Columbia. My reaction was one of great sorrow. I was so sorry for the people who had died, and for their families. I read an article briefly that detailed what had happened, but I was more interested in the articles that dealt with the astronauts themselves. I wanted to learn about them, their names, their ages, their jobs on the shuttle, where they were from, etc. In finding out information about the shuttle, I was the most interested in learning who the people themselves were. I'm the most sorry for their loss.

I was quite shocked to learn how very close it was to Earth when it first began to break up. The loss of the Columbia crew was heart wrenching. What was more horrifying was that I read in The New York Times that in some part of Texas and Louisiana people are finding the crew members amongst the debris. I think that this is an unfortunate mechanical problem and in no way related to terrorism. The loss of Israel's first astronaut is terribly tragic, but it should not be made into anything it is not. I certainly hope that the reason for the failure is able to be identified. I also hope that this incident does not impede future space explorations. That would be the greater tragic.

Their hearts were full of enthusiasm, pride in country, faith in their God and a willingness to accept risk in the pursuit of knowledge—knowledge that might improve the quality of life for all mankind. Columbia's 16-day mission of scientific discovery was a great success, cut short by mere minutes—yet it will live on forever in our memories. We want to thank the NASA family and people from around the world for their incredible outpouring of love and support. Although we grieve deeply, as do the families of Apollo 1 and Challenger before us, the bold exploration of space must go on. Once the root cause of this tragedy is found and corrected, the legacy of Columbia must carry on—for the benefit of our children and yours."

Men start road trip with victory over Colgate

By Dave Cohen
Senior Writer

The Bison men's basketball team began its first Friday-Sunday Patriot League road trip with a victory at Colgate by the count of 62-42 on Jan. 31. Boakai Lalugba '03 tallied 18 points and 10 rebounds, while the team shot 46 percent from the floor and 83 percent from the foul line. Although the squad picked up a win, Dan Blankenship '03 is not an advocate of playing two games in three days.

"I don't like it (the Friday-Sunday league schedule) because it gives an advantage to the teams with depth," Blankenship said. "With the current status of our team, we are obviously at a disadvantage."

This was evident, as Bucknell fell to Holy Cross 69-47 in front of a sold-out crowd of 4,000 in Worcester, Mass., Feb. 2. The Crusaders (16-4, 6-1) outscored the Bison 39-22 in the second half. Blankenship described the reasons for his team's poor second-half play.

"We let our offensive struggles affect our defense," Blankenship said. "You have to give it to Holy Cross because they played well and hit their shots. My foul trouble hurt our first-half performance."

Bucknell appeared to be in good shape, trailing only 36-31 with 16 minutes remaining in the game, but a 25-7 run in the next eight minutes by Holy Cross sealed the deal. The Crusaders drained five threes in the run, despite the fact that they failed to connect from downtown in the first stanza of play. A late 9-0 run by the Orange and Blue cut the Holy Cross deficit to 14 points, but it was too little, too late.

Bucknell's superstars were plagued by foul trouble in the first half. Lalugba, Blankenship and Davorin Skornik '04 all had three fouls respectively. Despite this, the Bison led 21-16 with seven minutes remaining in the half on a couple of Kevin Bettencourt '06 free throws. Bucknell did not convert on a field goal in the final 9 minutes, 41 seconds of the half and the Crusaders went into the locker room on a 14-4 run.

Lalugba had his 12th double-double of the season, scoring 11 points and grabbing 10 rebounds. In front of nearly 100 of his hometown fans, Bettencourt scored 10 points, all in the first half, while Blankenship added 11 of his own for the game. Chris Niesz '05 matched his career-high with nine points, connecting on all three of his three-point attempts. Niesz claims that he, as well as the team, is aware of the reasons for their lack of offensive productivity at times.

"We started taking bad shots," Niesz said. "We stopped moving on offense and we didn't let the game come to us. We tried to force things and then we lost our composure."

As for what it will take to knock off the league's two-time defending league champs next time around, Niesz said the team needs to improve on offense and defense.

"We need to stay out of foul trouble," Niesz said. "We need to defend better and score more points than them next time."

Assistant Coach Sean McAloon agreed that foul trouble will hamper the team's ability to compete with the Crusaders.

"We need to stay out of foul trouble and be smarter with our fouls," McAloon said. "If we play smarter, we can stay in the game with these guys [Holy Cross]. We lost our leadership on Sunday with Boakai and Danny being forced to sit on the bench so early. We had a couple of lineups out there that we weren't accustomed to having. It was a dire situation and we did not make plays when we needed to."

Bucknell was out-rebounded 37-31 and shot a mere 32 percent from the floor as the team fell to 10-10 overall and 4-3 in the Patriot League. The team resumes play tomorrow at 1p.m. in the nation's capital at American University.

Women head into Patriots undefeated

With a win over Lehigh the women end the regular season with an undefeated dual meet season

By Stephen Schwanhausser
Staff Writer

The Bucknell women's swimming and diving team competed against rival Lehigh in their final dual meet of the season last Saturday. This contest ends their normal season competition and, for the first time in school history, the team completed an undefeated dual-meet season as they crushed the Mountain Hawks 215-85. The meet was full of Bison victories as the team captured 1st in all but one event.

"It is always thrilling to beat Lehigh. We have had a long-time rivalry with them and victory always feels great," Head Coach Jerry Foley commented. "To finish our dual meet season in such terrific fashion bodes really well for the Patriot League Championships, it was certainly a Bison day."

The meet was an obvious success and the finality of the win shows the true depth of the squad.

The meet was kicked off in fabulous fashion with a win and school record in the 200-meter medley relay. The team of Darby Golino '03, Jamie Flick '05, Mary Krakowski '06 and Meghan Freese '04 finished in a time of 1 minute, 47.28 seconds, over five seconds ahead of Lehigh's top entry. As the meet continued, it was nothing but Bucknell success as Daniela Faas '04 won the 1,000 freestyle in a time of 10:30.05, crushing the heat and setting her best time of the season by almost six seconds. As the winner of the mile at Patriot League Championships in 2002, look for Faas to be a strong contributor at the 2003 event. In the 200 freestyle the victory came to Jen Cancro '04 as she finished in a time of 1:57.13 and was followed closely by Lectie Altman '06, who snagged 3rd in 1:58.08.

As the meet raged on with the first stroke event, the 100 backstroke, the Bison showed their depth as the trio of Golino, Altman, and Trish Rado '05 seized 1st through 3rd places, respectively. Golino finished in a time of 58.27, a personal and team best for this season.

After dipping under 30 seconds in the breastroke leg of the 200 medley relay, Flick was back in the 100 breaststroke to capture first in a time of 1:05.97, another season best.

The 200 butterfly was the only event in which the Bison were unable to capture gold. They did the next best thing as Jackie Feinthel '04, Becky Dolan '03 and Vanessa Scaringi '06 placed 2nd through 4th, respectively.

Next the Bison dominated the 50 freestyle as Freese captured 1st in a time of 24.12, only .02 seconds slower than her winning time in this event at last year's Patriot League Championships. She was backed up by teammates Krakowski and Erica Wild '06, who finished in 25.18 and 25.20 for 2nd and 3rd places, respectively. Freese was the winner once again in the 100-yard free, where she destroyed the heat and finished in 52.63.

Lectie Altman '06 explodes off the blocks in the dual meet against Lehigh on Saturday. Darby Golino '03 (58.27), Altman (1:00.51) and Tricia Rado '05 (1:02.62) captured the top three times in the 100 backstroke. Before the meet the Bison honored seniors Gonzalo Diaz, Rebecca Dolan, Christopher Feinthel, Golino, Michael Guskey, Geoffrey Konopka, Kurt McCoy, Lauren Mosler, Stelios Saffos and Stephen Schwanhausser as they competed in their final regular season Patriot League meet.

Bison extend winning streak to four

Bucknell women's basketball mounted another second-half comeback to defeat Colgate 70-62, extending their winning streak to four. Unfortunately, the long road trip caught up with the Bison as they fell at Holy Cross, 86-76. Bucknell is now 9-10 on the season and 4-3 in Patriot League play.

The Orange and Blue came out ice cold and finished the first frame shooting a dismal 26 percent. The teams were tied early before the host Raiders went on a 10-3 run en route to opening a 13-point lead. Bucknell managed only four points during the Colgate run, making a meager three out of 16 shots during the eight-minute span. The Orange and Blue only converted 10 shots from the field in the frame and headed to the locker room down 37-26.

"We are learning each day and trying to improve from practice to practice, game to game," Bucknell All-American Molly Creamer '03 said. "We are focusing on defense and rebounding; we need to get stronger in both areas."

The defense flexed its muscles in the second half as Bucknell mounted another terrific comeback. Colgate extended its lead to 13 points just over a minute into the second half. The Lady Bison scorched the nets with seven unanswered points over a two-minute span cutting the deficit to 41-35. The run ignited the Orange and Blue's stifling defense, which controlled the

Bison rewrite the record books at Penn State National Invite and Bison Open

By Evan Honeyfield
Staff Writer

"We had it cranked up," Assistant Track Coach Joe Klim said after Bucknell's track and field team put up a number of impressive performances between Bucknell's Bison Open and Penn State's National Invite last weekend.

Bucknell's all time top 10 lists are slowly being rewritten. Noel Powell '04 has been doing his share, as he added a school record 200-meter dash (21.94 seconds) to the list at Penn State. Ryan Newberger '05 was only 0.18 behind, also qualifying for the IC4A meet. Eric Furst '03 moved up to 4th all time in the 1,000 by running a very aggressive 2:25, putting Furst in a position to place high or even win the IC4A meet. Brian Klotz '03 bumped the infamous Andy Hunsburger '01 from the 500 list, with his 1:05 effort, just a half second shy of qualifying for the IC4A meet. Though not top 10 performances, Bryan Johnston '03 in the 5,000 and the distance medley relay of Furst, Klotz, Matias Palavecino '03 and Lou Palma '03 ran IC4A qualifying marks.

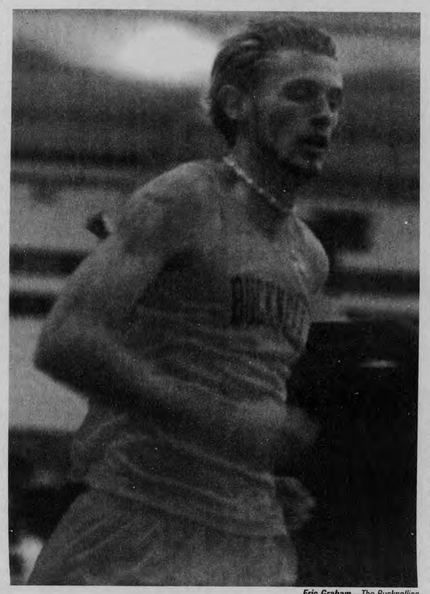
Not everyone benefited from focusing on individual events. Many athletes across the board, from distance runners to throwers felt flat.

"In general we [mid-distance runners] were pretty flat. I ran poorly the night before in the 1,200 [distance medley relay], and most of the mid-distance guys followed suit with mediocre performances on the second day of competition as well," Furst said.

Assistant Coach Bob Schanbacher was happy with senior Adam Kaufman's throwing and is expecting a breakout from him and some of the other throwers soon.

"They [throwers] have been making steady progress and have been getting a lot stronger. They are just looking to fix a few technical things," Schanbacher said.

The Lady Bison did some writing of record books, too. Jennifer Marsh '05 ran one of the best races of the weekend, with her 2:56 in the 1,000, qualifying her for the ECAC meet and putting her 4th all-time. Edwina Bourn '04 also moved to 4th all time in the 55 hurdles. Abby Bouzan-Kaloustian '04 benefited from vaulting at Penn State on Friday night and at home on Saturday, vaulting 10-6 to improve her 4th all-time mark. Working her way back from injuries, Tolu Fayanjuola '05 ran to 6th all-time in the 55 dash and won the long jump at the Bison Open. Amy Calvo '05 continued a fine season by qualifying for the ECAC meet in the 400 (57.26). The 5,000 was a tense, but satisfying race to watch for Head Coach Kevin Donner, as Theresa Dennis '03 was able to run the ECAC time, but by less than a second.



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Bryan Johnston '03 en route to victory during a Jan. 25 race. Johnston continued his success last Saturday by qualifying for ECACs in the 5,000.

"I was very happy with most of our athletes this weekend, although a few key people came up a little flat and that is an area where we need to improve. We did have some huge brekthroughs though," Donner said.

"I thought the team did an amazing job, both at Penn State and at home. The number of people who stepped it up this week was great. We're one step closer to a defending the League title," Marsh said.

Kent State's Boug Raymond Invite is next up for the Bison. Kent State will be providing rabbits from 800-3,000 meters to ensure fast times.

"It's a high caliber meet with many open and unattatched runners and partial teams," Donner said.

"The word on the street is that the mile at Kent will be loaded. Hopefully Lou [Palma] and I can represent in that, possibly providing the first top 10 mile performances in a long time. Kent has an oversized—292-meter—indoor track, which attracts those who have specific time qualifying goals. As a result, many athletes will be attempting NCAA times at this meet, with countless others searching for IC4A/ECAC qualifying marks," Furst said.

Tennis gears up for spring season

By Pat Evans

The Bucknell men's tennis team opens up its spring season at The Cornell Duals today, where it will face Binghamton and Cornell and look to gain valuable match experience. The young team hopes to build upon a successful fall season that was highlighted by a 2nd-place finish out of 11 teams in the ECAC Championship, the team's highest finish in University history.

Captain Todd Jacobs '03 will be playing his final season for the squad. After providing an integral role since his rookie season, Jacobs is now the only upperclassman on the team. Jacobs hopes that he can motivate the younger players on the team to achieve their ultimate goal of winning the Patriot League Championship.

> "The team had a great fall, finishing the highest it has ever finished and we believe that they have the talent and work ethic to improve."
> —Rebecca Helt, head coach

"It's important to me to set a good example for the younger guys, and to have a good season. They are very motivated and eager to make an impression on the League," Jacobs said.

Head Coach Rebecca Helt is pleased with how the team has been preparing during the preseason. The Bison have been practicing three times a week and combining that with a new strength and conditioning program that they feel will be very helpful.

"The team had a great fall, finishing the highest it has ever finished and we believe that they have the talent and work ethic to improve," Helt said. "The strength and conditioning program should really pay off this season."

Jacobs and Helt will rely upon the team's core nucleus of Gerald DiChiara '05, Asher Salam '06, Nick Denefrio '05, Joe Menezes '05 and Leland Tien '05, who all made significant contributions in the fall. The team's age doesn't seem to discourage their optimism about the season.

"Although we're young, we're hungry and we love the sport, which I think is a big edge we have," Denefrio said.

Last season the team's underclassmen showed that the Bison have a bright future ahead of them, shrugging off any misconceptions that the fall would be a rebuilding year for the squad.

Salam advanced to the semi-final round of the Patriot League Flighted Championship, Denefrio lost in the finals of the ECAC Championship and Menezes and Tien were not far behind. DiChiara and Salam teamed up in the doubles at the ECAC Championships and took home the only gold.

The Bison will bring their top five singles players and one doubles combination this weekend, but are not sure exactly who the players will be yet. The team looks at the Cornell Duals as an opportunity to gain experience before the upcoming season.

"We're not even so much concerned with how we play yet," Helt said. "We're really focusing on gaining match experience."

The players are also looking forward to the experience.

"We will be playing very good teams in Cornell and Binghamton," Jacobs said. "We will get to see where we stand, and it's a good chance for everyone to play and get the experience we need."

The Bison will continue the weekend with matches against Niagra and Buffalo tomorrow.

This time is only .016 seconds slower than her time from last year's championship meet in which she placed 2nd.

In the diving events, Sarah Petcavage '04 dominated both the 1- and 3-meter boards claiming 1st in both events. She was backed up by teammate Lisa Rockwell '06 in the 1-meter competition as she edged out the competition by two points to claim 2nd place.

On to the distance stroke events, it was Golino and Altman who took 1st and 2nd, respectively, in the 200 backstroke. Darby finished 1st in a time of 2:05.11, another season best for her.

In the 200 breast stroke it was Flick who was on fire, once again finishing 1st in a time of 2:23.75. Not only was she six seconds ahead of the competition, but less than a second off of her best time from the 2002 season during which she placed 2nd at championships.

In the final individual freestyle event of the day, the 500, the combination of Faas, Canro and Feinthel nabbed 1st through 3rd in times of 5:08.84, 5:12.19 and 5:13.95, respectively. Krakowski was victorious in the 100 butterfly, finishing in a time of 58.73.

Leslie Rice '05 swimming in the 200-meter backstroke last Saturday. The women's team captured a 215-85 win over Lehigh.

In the final individual event of the day, the 200 individual medley, Golino finished on a high note capturing 1st in a time of 2:09.76, less than half a second slower than the time that placed her 5th at last year's Patriots. Her performances throughout the day won her the Patriot League Swimmer of the Week award.

The team finished strongly as the quartet of Freese, Flick, Wild and Altman finished 1st in the 400 freestyle relay with a time of 4:39.87 to seal the win. The swimmers were pleased with their performance.

"Today was truly impressive. To finish the season undefeated with school records and so many people close to their best times was incredible," Freese said. "After losing last year's championship by only 30 points we were really out for blood and I think we have proved to the rest of the league that we will be a force to be reckoned with in three weeks."

The team looks forward to its championship meet at home on Feb. 20.

Bad choices: the Raiders' worst mistake

Imagine, for a moment, that you've just finished playing in the most important game of your life. The glaring lights on the Qualcomm Stadium scoreboard are lined up in their brilliant little formations to outline all sorts of numbers, which now are frozen in history.

The final score reads 48-21. Your team's name is next to the 21.

Imagine your opponents dancing around you in delirium. Imagine the joy flashing in their eyes, reflecting off the beaming silver surface of the coveted Lombardi Trophy, while all you can do is stand there in silence, with your cleats digging into the soft layer of crimson and black confetti that falls around you, each scrap performing its own little jeering dance on its way past your despondent face.

Imagine the embarrassment of having faltered on the biggest stage in sports, knowing that in some way, your name will forever be linked to a historical failure.

Picture, now, a different scene.

This time, imagine you're the one in delirium. Only it's not the kind of delirium that sportswriters write about. It's the kind of delirium where you don't know exactly where you are, what you've done or what you're about to do.

Imagine being only half as terrified of the Buccaneer's defensive line as you are of yourself. Imagine that you've gone through the recent years of your life unsure, on a day-to-day basis, whether the next few hours will leave you elated enough to take on the world or too depressed to move.

On this night, the most important game of your life just ended. You weren't even there. There's no confetti. No flashing scoreboard. No deafening cheers from the stands. No dark San Diego sky.

Just the empty, sterile hospital air, sad fluorescent lights and the din of white noise. No teammates to share in your misery, share the blame, pat you on the back and look forward to next year.

Imagine the pain of reading about your own exploits, much of which you don't even remember, in every paper printed across the country. There, laid across newsprint in black and white, are the words of your own teammates, calling you a traitor, wishing to see you banished, promising never to forgive you.

Welcome to Barret Robbins' nightmare.

Robbins' pre-Super Bowl misadventures have been widely publicized in the days following the game. The Raiders' all-pro center was missing-in-action during an early team meeting on Jan. 25, didn't appear at the team's afternoon walk-through and then showed up at an evening meeting in a state of "incoherence." Head Coach Bill Callahan sent him packing immediately, banning him from Super Bowl participation, and shortly thereafter, Robbins ended up on suicide watch in a San Diego hospital.

The next day his teammates marched on without him, and ended up shaming themselves in the biggest game of the year. The media's scapegoat? Robbins, of course.

After all, it was easy to observe from the sidelines and draw tragic comparisons to the Bengals' Stanley Wilson, who strung himself out on cocaine the night before Super Bowl XXIII, or to the Falcons' Eugene Robinson, whose libido stunted his efforts in Super Bowl XXXIII. Stupid choices.

If anybody should have been able to differentiate between a "stupid choice" and Robbins' downfall, it should have been the 52 men that share the roster with him. But after all the confetti had fallen, after they had watched their season expire disastrously, when it was time to answer to the media, they didn't express a lot of concern for their fallen teammate. Without hesitation, they lashed out with rabid vehemence against Robbins.

"If Barret Robbins comes back, I won't. You can print that," lineman Frank Middleton said.

Perhaps most vitriolic of comments fired in Robbins' direction came from Mo Collins, the team's left guard, who regularly bestrides Robbins on Oakland's offensive line when the team goes into battle.

"Whatever rock he crawled out from under, he can stay there," Collins said. "I would welcome him back as a business partner, but not as a brother. A brother wouldn't leave you hanging like that."

It didn't seem to occur to Collins, or Middleton, or the other Raiders who launched a battery of criticism towards Robbins, to help their teammate shoulder the burden of that rock. That he wasn't slapped with a medical label until a week later should have been no factor. It was obvious that something was terribly wrong with the 320-pound center.

Linebacker Bill Romanowski, a man usually depicted as heartless and unrelenting, managed to see it. When a journalist asked him if he was mad at Robbins, he had no barbs to toss in the lineman's direction.

"No. The guy's got a problem. He's got to get some help," Romanowski said.

For some reason, few others saw what Romanowski found so obvious on Jan. 27. They should have recognized Robbins' distress. They should have remembered past episodes and his documented struggles with depression and bipolar symptoms. Why was that sympathy beyond their capacity until somebody dangled a diagnosis in front of them?

It was obvious in 1952, when Boston Red Sox outfielder Jim Piersall succumbed to a mental breakdown and had to be dragged off kicking and screaming and institutionalized for months. His teammates figured it out, even though Piersall's distress wasn't given a label until decades later.

They could see he was hurting. They could see his actions were beyond the realm of his control, and that he probably would have given anything simply to have that control back. That was all it took, even in the harsh, politically incorrect and socially unaccepting 1950s.

It's 2003, and while ethnicity, gender and sexuality are tiptoed around and carefully guided towards social equity, Robbins' fiasco would suggest that some disabilities—the ones no one can see or entirely explain—are greeted with no more compassion from the general public than they were 50 years ago. And that's sad.

Somewhere along the line, while society nitpicked its way toward a perfectly regulated system of political correctness and sensitivity, good old-fashioned compassion fell by the wayside.

It's sad that Robbins' teammates, no matter how clearly they can see it now, will never be able to take back what they said about their comrade. A lot of them have tried. They've offered their well-wishes and expressed their concern.

But the fact is, the biggest game of their life is over and they blew it. They blew it well after the clock had ticked zero, in the locker room, when faced with a decision to assume the worst about their teammate or hold back their speculation long enough to realize that something wasn't right. They chose to attack.

Robbins, when he recovers from this episode, will sit down and read those comments at some point. Maybe that's the saddest part of the whole thing. When he needs support the most, as he battles with this nightmarish disorder, he's going to know that those accusatory words were the first thing to fly out of his teammates'—his brothers'—mouths. And that's just not right.

A brother shouldn't leave you hanging like that.

Just play the game

LeBron James was suspended for only two high school games by County Judge James Williams for accepting jerseys in the price range of $845.

"He's made mistakes," James' attorney, Fred Nance said. "He's an 18-year-old kid, but he didn't deserve the ultimate sanction of losing his eligibility," Nance said.

James, touted as the next Michael Jordan, should spend that time looking over the lottery ball system used by the NBA for determining the first pick in the NBA draft. While this suspension is mild and has no effect on his status in the draft, I'd like to chat about a few more notable suspensions and their accompanying stories.

So have you been to Atlantic City for some gambling of late? Well, how about betting on sports? Say baseball anyone? We begin with the story of Pete Rose, Cincinnati Reds legend, who holds the all-time hits record in MLB. Having a firm grasp of the game, Rose naturally took to coaching and the Reds welcomed him in 1984. In 1989 it became known that Rose bet on baseball and, yes, even on his own team. (That's a bad no-no.) Following baseball protocol he was immediately banned from the sport in 1989 by Commissioner A. Bartlett Giamatti, who said, "Let no one think it did not hurt baseball. That hurt will pass, however, as the great glory of the game asserts itself and a resilient institution goes forward. Let it also be clear that no individual is superior to the game."

The banishment not only interrupted his coaching career, but ended his chances of being in the Hall of Fame—an issue hotly contested to date.

Anyone that has played organized sports has come across a coach that you despised and wished would just "close his or her mouth." Well Latrell Sprewell, then with the Golden State Warriors, had a much more creative gesture. He attacked his coach, P.J. Carlesimo, during a Dec. 1, 1997 practice, first choking him and then returning to punch him in the head. An inhumane act of pure frustration in his game, Sprewell was swiftly punished. NBA commissioner Daniel Stern suspended him for a year (actually only 68 games) and lost his salary for that year.

Ice Skating anyone? Ah, yes, if you are like my grandma that can't get enough of those CBS Christmas ice skating specials, then this suspension is for you! Remember back a few years when figure skating was the ultimate American sport? Everyone fought to get on the cover of the Wheaties box? We begin with Tonya Harding and her husband, Jeff Gillooly, who hired a "hitman" to club rival skater Nancy Kerrigan in the knee two days before the 1994 U.S. Nationals. As the Disney classic would have it, Harding won the Nationals and a spot on the Olympic team. Kerrigan would have her day in the sun and received an extra spot on the squad due to past performances.

Harding demonstrated the Decker Effect—big buildup with little results—delivering a "Close-your-eyes-honey-the-monster-is-approaching" performance. And who can forget about her shoelace? She returned home, pled guilty to conspiring to hinder prosecution of a case, was stripped of her national title and banned by the USGA for life. And remember, "The Club" should be used in all situations in which you are fearful!

Athletes are no different than any other individual and as such are held to the same rights and responsibilities. Muhammad Ali felt this firsthand when he refused to go into the Army in 1967, stating he had no hatred of the Viet Cong Vietnamese. Because of this draft evasion, The New York State Athletic Commission took away his boxing license and stripped him of his heavyweight title. On June 28, 1971, Ali's name was cleared by the Supreme Court, ruling he was improperly drafted and that Ali was indeed sincere in his religious beliefs. Yearning to regain his coveted awards, Ali fought again and regained his title on Oct. 30, 1974, more than seven years after he'd had it taken away.

So what have we learned? Betting is a major no-no, wait until you are 21 to gamble (to delay your debts), send your coach a nice present, use "The Club" and stand up for what you believe in. Play the game for what it was meant to be—fun.

Phanning the Phenom Phlame

Forgive me. It appears that all sports writers must, at some point, reference a certain person in every article these days so I'm just going to get it out of the way so it won't interrupt my flow or your attention or the petty sycophantic babbling of a million journalists who want to get in on the ground floor of the LeBron James sweepstakes as they conveniently scrape the "A"s off their Chrysler Lebarons in homage to the boy wonder.

He can't lose. He can't win. He's 18 and he has all the major problems of a hormone-laden high schooler, a NBA prospect, a teen icon, a pop culture icon, a media icon and probably has more political clout than Ted Kennedy. With better name recognition than Alan Shepard, LeBron James is almost assured of being picked first in the NBA draft.

No wonder his mother bought him a Hummer. Picture yourself, sitting on the couch, watching "I Love Lucy" reruns and munching on a corndog (this is pretty much all your life consists of since you live in Akron, Ohio where single-sex dinosaurs are more likely to reproduce than you are). Your son is a great ballplayer. You and most of the neighborhood know this. One day you wake from your quasi-REM-delirium, the stench of Dorito toxins wafting from your unbrushed word-hole, you stumble towards the door to pick up your 11-cent Akron Weekly Gazette when you notice that your well-endowed son is to be knighted in a ceremony next week at Buckingham. Now look around your trailer with white curtains that resemble more of an auburn and ask yourself, "Why wouldn't I buy a Hummer?"

Not that I know anything about this boy's home life. I don't care, nor do I pretend to want to look up that information because quite frankly it's none of my business. Why is it that fame equals full disclosure of everything in your life? Which leads me to another point: There is nothing this boy can do wrong.

Even the decision that he was ineligible to play high school ball ever again because he accepted gifts worth about $850 (against Ohio state rules) was overturned and the courts only suspended him for two games, games which can be selected by the basketball team.

Now, there are two ways we can look at this. We can say, "Finally, these guys are getting off this poor kid's back. Let him just play ball and have fun." The other is, "What the fanoiwerbqigl?!!?" Again we view the atrocity that is "fame." Fame conquers all. More so than previous adages like "beautiful women get what they want" or "white Anglo-Saxon protestant males will always succeed in life."

Fame can buy your way out of trouble, not just with monetary resources, but with endorsements, "I met him at a pizzeria ..." stories, or simple intimidation. I won't lie. If I were to ever pass Liz Hurley on the street and it were raining I would probably gasp, tilt my head up to the sky with my mouth open and run around in circles until I drowned in a pool of saliva and rainwater like a chicken. And if it weren't raining, I'd probably just watch her pass, then make an immediate turn and walk out into oncoming traffic. But maybe that's just me ... I'm a different breed of cat.

At this point, I want to give kudos to those who realized earlier on that I said I'd just mention LeBron in passing, but rather spent the entire article discussing him. You deserve a pat on the back, or perhaps at least a LeBron jersey.

But what's saddest about the whole scenario is that this boy has "bust" shaved into the back of his scalp like a follicular "kick me" sign. When it comes down to it, there's no victory for him. His life is already written for him. Predestination at its purest. He can't choose to go to college at this point, though I'm sure that colleges would offer him a scholarship with the swiftness of a hyperkinetic cheetah undergoing endorphin therapy.

So when he shows up in the NBA, 30 pounds overweight, unable to adjust to the competition, jamming to the Counting Crows as he glides down the freeway in his Hummer because he's too depressed to deal with his own fame because again, he's only 18, and now he's got the vast weight of the Almighty pressing at his back because even God likes to see a good dunk from time to time, tell me the mental trapdoor isn't going to swing out from under his sanity like a Groucho Marx cameo. We'll be lucky if by 20 LeBron still remembers how to spell his name.

But despite sarcasm to the contrary, I'm not mad at LeBron. In fact, I wish him the best of luck. I don't envy the path his life is taking, or the path that is taking him. I regret that this decision is forced upon him so soon. There are a lot of jokes made about freshmen being dumb, but the fact is, they are. I was there too. After four years, I'm STILL dumb.

The point is, I'm still dumb and I'm about to graduate. If I were two feet taller, had any sort of tolerance for exercise, or even skill, I could register for the draft in a few months and I STILL wouldn't be mentally ready for it. LeBron has a long road ahead of him. Alexander Pope wrote, "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread." Let's pray Lebron is no fool.

The decline of the All-Star game

By Mark Walker
Staff Writer

Many sports fans might not have noticed (or cared to notice), but two of the four major sports played their all-star games this past Sunday. The NHL and NFL both showcased the best players that they have to offer, but very few fans cared enough to tune in.

A few decades ago, all-star games were quite possibly the biggest spectacles in all of sports. Then why is it that these showcases of the greatest athletes in the world are now met with such lukewarm interest?

Our parents will undoubtedly tell us that all-star games have lost their luster because of the development of technology that has given sports greater exposure. Our parents' generation did not grow up with ESPN, "Sportscenter," DirecTV or nationally televised games of the week. Therefore, all-star games were their only opportunity to see all of the great players that they read about in the newspaper but could never see because they played in other regions of the country.

Our generation has taken the increased exposure of sports for granted. Every morning we can turn on ESPN and see highlights of what the greatest athletes across the country did the previous night. As a result, the uniqueness of seeing these superstars in all-star games has been lost.

Another reason that has contributed to the downfall of all-star games is that the players simply do not care about the game's outcome. In the past, players took much greater pride in being named an all-star and, as a result, gave their best effort in the game to represent their league. Now, some superstars are so uninterested in playing in an all-star game that they opt to relax by the pool or enjoy a few rounds of golf instead of representing their league. Those who do participate in the game have such little interest in the outcome of the game that they ease up to avoid injuring themselves or others.

Case in point can be found in comparing the 1970 MLB all-star game with last year's Midsummer Classic. In 1970, Pete Rose actually barreled over catcher Ray Fosse to score the winning run in the 12th inning for the National League. On the contrary, last year's all-star game ended in a tie following the 11th inning, which sent a clear message that the game's outcome no longer mattered.

So how can the four major sports leagues (NFL, MLB, NHL, NBA) stimulate the public's interest in their all-star games?

There is a simple solution to create more interest in the NFL's Pro Bowl, which is traditionally held the Sunday following the Super Bowl. The Super Bowl is the highest of highs for NFL fans, and most NFL fans reluctantly declare that the season is over after the Vince Lombardi Trophy is awarded. Therefore, very few fans care to tune in to a meaningless exhibition game after watching the greatest game of the year.

Next year, the NFL is once again having a bye week before the Super Bowl. In my opinion, the Pro Bowl would receive a lot more interest if the NFL moves it to this bye week, while NFL fans still have their appetite whet for football.

The one drawback to placing the game before the Super Bowl is that players on teams in the Super Bowl would have to skip the game. This would not be much of a problem; as it is, players in the Super Bowl rarely have the desire to fly to Hawaii after the biggest game of their careers. Many Pro Bowlers in the Super Bowl, like Warren Sapp, say that they are too banged up to go to the Pro Bowl and stay at home.

Major League Baseball's owners recently approved a plan to create greater incentive for the players to give their all in the all-star game. They want to award the extra home game in the World Series to the team representing the league that won the all-star game. Pending approval of the Players' Association, this plan would also give fans of contenders a significant reason to root for their league in the Midsummer Classic.

As for the NBA and NHL, they could boost interest by experimenting with new rules during the all-star game. Fans are always proposing rule changes to increase excitement, and these leagues could use their all-star games to experiment with these ideas.

The NHL experimented with a shootout following overtime on Sunday, which many fans would like to see in regular season play. The uniqueness of witnessing a shootout kept many viewers on the edge of their seats to the end of the contest.

These proposed changes might make the all-star games somewhat more exciting. The only way to completely regain the appeal of an all-star game is to get the players to once again care about its outcome. Until we see a home plate collision between Jason Giambi and Mike Piazza to decide an all-star game, these showcases of the world's greatest athletes will remain lackluster.

It is hard to imagine at this very campus where men and women live only a dorm room apart, that at one time men were required to live entirely uphill, and women entirely downhill. It is hard to imagine that at one point it was impossible to find a woman engineer, not to mention a female professor, anywhere on campus. It is even harder to imagine that at a place where women are offered more varsity sports than men, they were once offered none.

These are the changes the University has made since its establishment in 1865. They did not happen overnight, nor did they happen back in the "Dark Ages" when students' great-grandparents were kids. Most of these changes happened only 30 years ago when students' mothers and fathers were the same age their kids are right now.

The jumpstart to these changes happened in 1972 when former U.S. President Richard Nixon signed Title IX into law. Title IX worked to stop sex discrimination anywhere federal funding was provided—from preschools to institutions of higher education. Since then, the University has experienced changes everywhere from student enrollment to the more controversial issue of athletic participation.

The year Title IX was passed, there were two male undergraduates for every woman undergraduate at the University; and even that was considered an improvement from previous years. Of 50 students graduating with a business degree and 80 graduating engineers, only one female received a degree from each. Similarly, it was rare to find a female professor or administrator anywhere on campus.

The number of men and women admitted to Bucknell has leveled off, beginning with the mixing of housing arrangements after 1972. Last year, the numbers of male and female students enrolled were 51.5 percent and 48.5 percent, respectively.

As enrollment numbers continue to become more balanced, the number of females studying and working in each department has also continued to increase. Recently, the number of woman engineers has ranged around the 30 percent mark, female business graduates have been around 43 percent and the number of female administrators has been closer to 40 percent.

The greatest fight for equality, however, has been in the field of athletics. Before Title IX, there were 11 sports offered for males and only four for females; of these four sports, none were varsity. One of the biggest selling points for the building of the Fieldhouse, which opened in 1987, was that it would be a unisex facility in compilation with Title IX.

Offering a unisex facility was not enough. In order to meet the compliance for Title IX, schools had to demonstrate one of three options. They had to either show a history of expansion to accommodate the underrepresented gender, show that the interest and abilities of the underrepresented sex have been fully and effectively met or follow the proportionality rule. Since the first two options are both vague and difficult to prove, many schools, including the University, chose proportionality.

Under the proportionality rule, the number of female athletes at a college or university must be proportionate to the number of female undergraduate students, with the same holding true for men.

As if that wasn't enough, in 1996, the Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights issued a rule that "schools must count actual athletes, not spots available on teams, to prove gender equity."

This left many schools with a huge problem since, regardless of the amount of sports offered to both genders, statistics showed that more males were interested in participating in sports than females. The University was no exception. In the 1996-97 school year, men represented 63 percent of varsity athletics while women represented only 37 percent.

In hopes of adding a greater female interest in athletics, in 1998, the University decided to add two new sports. Women's water polo and golf now evened off the total number of sports offered—14 for men and 14 for women. Everything appeared to be equal, from the outside at least.

Numbers and statistics proved that the University didn't even out from the inside. In 2001, 41.9 percent of its athletes were women. Of its undergraduates, however, 48.7 percent were female. It didn't matter that an equal number of sports were offered to both genders; the percentages didn't match, and under the proportionality rule, that's all that matters.

Having found that adding female sports did not meet the Title IX requirement, the only thing left to do was to cut down the number of male athletes by eliminating men's sports to balance out the percentages.

In May of 2002, the University announced that men's wrestling and crew would no longer be federally funded varsity programs. Instead, they Bucknell's men's crew team was among the causualties of Title IX regulations at the University, as the team has gradually been reduced from varsity status to its current classification as a club varsity organization. I recently had the opportunity to speak with Brian Albert (BA), Ben Pfeiffer (BP) and Aaron Bates (AB), all seniors on the team. Each shared his thoughts on Title IX and its effects.

The Bucknellian: In the past two years, Bucknell has made a number of moves to increase its compliance with Title IX statutes. How have these moves affected the men's crew team?

BA: The University was very helpfull in allowing us to stay on campus under a new classification. This classification, known as club varsity, permits us to continue competing as we have in the past, while at the same time allowing the University to comply with Title IX regulations.

The Bucknellian: What is your general attitude towards Title IX as a law, and Title IX in practice?

BP: Since it's inception Title IX has dramatically increased opportunities in women's collegiate athletics. However, current interpretation of the statute has led to unfortunate consequences for certain men's athletic programs during recent years—consequences not intended at the time of the statute's passage.

The Bucknellian: Do you feel that the success of men's sports are affected by Title IX?

BA: Initially Title IX had little effect on men's sports, it simply increased opportunities for women. However, in receant years many schools have resorted to the scaling back or elimination of men's sports as an alternative to adding women's sports.

The Bucknellian: If you could make any changes to the Title IX rule, what would you change, if anything?

AB: One way in which it is possible to reform Title IX would be to allow colleges and universities to more effectively use the third prong of compliance. This prong allows colleges and universities to prove that they are indeed meeting the needs and demands of the college or university's population.

The Bucknellian: Would you consider Title IX an overall success (i.e. Do the positives outweigh the negatives?)?

BP: The dramatic increase in college athletic opportunities for women since the passage of Title IX suggests that the original intent of the law has been extraordinarily successful. And in a country far more culturally self-aware than it was three decades ago, it seems unlikely that even if Title IX was eliminated today, women's sports would somehow be marginalized. But elimination of the statute is not necessary to remedy the problems that have arisen related to the demands of gender equity. Rather, legislators should overhaul the statute to allow individual institutions the ability to meet the demands of their students, rather than the demands of a federal law that does not have provisions for the diverse spectrum of athletic opportunities available to today's college athletes.

Girls sacrifice too

Indifference: this seems to be the attitude of the students toward girls' sports on campus. Most people seem to view girls' athletics as little more than a recreational activity. However, it is basically those people who have been involved in athletics who realize the dedication and determination for participation in sports.

Due to this attitude of indifference, there is little support displayed for the girls who participate in intercollegiate competition, although there has been a somewhat greater increase shown over the last year. Hopefully interest will continue to grow as women's sports begin to develop on campus and throughout the country. If more people can be made aware of the girls' athletic schedule, perhaps a greater degree of support would be manifest in the student body.

Too many people fail to realize the amount of time spent in practice for intercollegiate sports. This can range from 1½ to 3 hours a day for five days a week with an occasional weekend meet to replace another workout. This requires that the athlete carefully arrange her schedule for both studying and social life.

Practices, of course, prepare the athlete for the meets. This year the women's swim team participated in 3 dual meets and two championships which included the Easterns, which were held in New Haven, Connecticut, and the Nationals, which were held in Cincinnati, Ohio. Swimmers for the latter came anywhere from California to Florida to New England. One of the greatest thrills at the Nationals was being able to compete against present world record-holders and former Pan Am and U.S. Olympic team members. It was a strange feeling—a mixture of awe, fear and excitement.

State spirit was high at each of the championship meets. The cry of "Pennsylvania's No. 1, we shall not be beat!" rang out from the bleachers as girls from Clarion, Slippery Rock, Penn State, West Chester, and Bucknell cheered collectively for one another. The friendships made in the dual-meet season were reinforced at both of the championships.

The rewarding experiences of the last two weekends of the season (those spent in New Haven and Cincinnati) cause us to look forward to continued success in next year's season.

Hopefully with an increase of interest, the women's athletic program can expand. For, as the saying goes, "Winning isn't everything." It is the new friendships generated at both the practices and dual meets; being able to work towards a goal; and the unique experiences gained in the competition at championship meets.

Thirty-one years of Title IX

By Jim Leahy

An unassuming building on the campus of Duke University, in Durham, N.C., played host to an incredibly important women's basketball game last weeked. The game was a showdown between the No. 1 ranked team in the nation, Duke's Blue Devils, and the No. 2 ranked team in the nation, the University of Connecticut's Lady Huskies. The game was sold out and televised nationally by ESPN.

Why this outpouring of support for women's athletics? Many argue that a law, passed in 1972, began the revolution bringing more attention and money to women's sports in the United States. The law, Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, has changed the way colleges and universities deal with women's sports programs and it promises to continue maintaining weight in the minds of athletic directors throughout collegiate sports.

Since Title IX was made a part of U.S. law, there has been an amazing amount of dispute surrounding its meaning, its scope and even if it should remain part of the nation's federal code.

The history of Title IX is a long and complicated one. Presidential administrations have also showed varying degrees of support for the legislation and all the things that come with it. While the legislation is in the forefront under the current

From the coach: an interview

By Cecily Cairns
Sports Editor

This past Tuesday I had the opportunity to discuss Title IX and the state of women's athletics with Cindy Opalski, head coach of the University's highly respected volleyball team. Opalski, who has coached the Lady Bison since 1990, shared her thoughts on the quest for gender equality in collegiate sports.

The Bucknellian: What is your general attitude toward Title IX and its repercussions?

CO: I have mixed emotions in regards to the advancement of Title IX, both here on the Bucknell campus and nationally. Although I think we have made tremendous progress to accommodate the needs of our female athletes, especially in comparable sports, we have yet to provide the necessary staffing and recruiting resources for all of our women's teams, enabling them to have an optimal experience in Division I athletics. It disappoints me that opponents of Title IX feel in some instances that we, as women, chose the path of equity through them. I have an expectation to be treated fairly; something my parents engrained in me many, many years ago. It is not meant to be at anyone's expense; it is simply the right thing to do.

The Bucknellian: Do you feel that recent effects of Title IX on Bucknell athletics (i.e. the disbandment of the wrestling and crew programs) are justified?

CO: No one wants to see equity on the women's side at the expense of our male athletic programs. It really comes down to a resource issue ... finding additional resources to create parity in women's programs without affecting competitive success of our men's teams. That is certainly a formidable job that requires bold and innovative action on the part of our leadership here at Bucknell and across the United States. Clearly, it requires an increased financial commitment from all universities to achieve gender equity.

The Bucknellian: If you could make any changes to the Title IX rule, what would you change, if anything?

CO: I would de-emphasize the proportionality issue. It is not necessarily about participation opportunities ... it is about the quality of the experience. I would set specific compliance deadlines for all institutions and create more initiatives that would directly affect the well-being and success of our female athletes. Immediate adjustments to coaching staffs (funding assistant coaching positions) and increased recruiting dollars would have the most profound impact on our student-athletes here at Bucknell.

The Bucknellian: How do you feel about the current strengths of women's collegiate athletics in general and specifically at Bucknell? Are female athletes still short shifted?

CO: There are outstanding coaches here who work hard to maintain high standards for their students and are clearly focused on the well-being of their student-athletes. Clearly the emphasis we all have is to enable our athletes to experience success in a competitive arena while tending to the real reason they are here at college ... to get a first-rate education.

The Bucknellian: Would you consider Title IX an overall success (i.e. Do the positives outweigh the negatives?)?

CO: We are on the right path. I have difficulty resolving equity issues at the expense of male athletes and men's athletic programs. It is important that we apply ourselves to a standard of success against our competition rather than at the expense of each other. Most of us would agree; the law is just, but the implementation is oftentimes flawed.

The Bucknellian: Women's athletics have clearly come a long way since 1972. Are they strong enough now to hold their own without the assistance of a strict written rule like Title IX, or do you feel that repealing or amending the rule would lead to regression in gender equity?

CO: We have not reached equity with a federal law adopted over 30 years ago; certainly we are not strong enough to stand on our own. The growth in women's athletics has been phenomenal over the last several years with guidance from the constitution and the NCAA. My hope is that we will enact stricter, yet more practical guidelines, and more aggressive measures to attain equity across all facets of our athletic programs.

Reaching Title IX compliance

In the assessment of the "interests and abilities" portion of the Title IX regulations, a three part test governs. As the name suggests, this test consists of three separate and distinct parts. All that is required under Title IX is that an institution be in compliance with one part of that test. No one part of the test is the predominant or "true" measure of compliance. The three parts of the test are:

- Part One: Substantial Proportionality. This part of the test is satisfied when participation opportunities for men and women are "substantially proportionate" to their respective undergraduate enrollments.
- Part Two: History and Continuing Practice. This part of the test is satisfied when an institution has a history and continuing practice of program expansion that is responsive to the developing interests and abilities of the underrepresented sex (typically female).
- Part Three: Effectively Accommodating Interests and Abilities. This part of the test is satisfied when an institution is meeting the interests and abilities of its female students even where there are disproportionately fewer females than males participating in sports.

Tinkering with Title IX

Between lawsuits and a Bush committee, Title IX may get a facelift

By Brian Klotz
Senior Writer

Title IX was once again the center of attention as the Commission on Opportunity in Athletics announced on Jan. 30 that it had finished its six-month study. The committee met to discuss ways to improve Title IX's original mission. Nearly 30 years later in 2000, there were over of 151,000 women playing NCAA sports. Even at the high school level, the number of female athletes increased from 294,000 to nearly 2.8 million during the same period.

The debate is not about the successes of the law, but its continuing detrimental effects on men's sports programs. Since Title IX's passage, more than 170 wrestling programs, 80 men's tennis teams, 70 men's gymnastics teams and 45 men's track teams have been cut from NCAA institutions, according to the General Accounting Office.

"We embrace Title IX; it's a very good law," said Mike Moyer, executive director of the National Wrestling Coaches Association. "It's poorly interpreted. It was never intended to be a quota program. It's now about too many male athletes being in an athletic department."

"This is just about predetermining the amount of discrimination we're going to practice. If this goes through, in perpetuity women are going to be underrepresented, underprivileged, and I can never support that."
—Christine A. Grant, former women's athletic director, University of Iowa

The argument by many that Title IX has been wrongly interpreted as a quota system, caused the Commission on Opportunity in Athletics to investigate, debate and research possible recommendations for the Secretary of Education on what to do. Their first place to look was in how institutions were reacting to the 1979 clarification of Title IX, which requires colleges to meet one of three criteria: The proportion of athletes from each sex participating in sports should be roughly equal to the proportion of students of that sex in its undergraduate population; the college shows a "history of continuing to practice" a commitment to adding women's sports opportunities; or that the college proves that the athletic interests of female students are being "fully and effectively accommodated."

In 1996, the Department of Education (DOE) again modified the first prong of Title IX by requiring colleges to count every name on a team's roster, including scholarship and non-scholarship athletes, starters and non-starters. This is one of the main platforms of the wrestling lawsuit, which argues that the 1996 rules exceed the DOE's statutory authority "by effectively mandating the very discrimination that Title IX prohibits."

The lawsuit is an attempt to stop the staggering drops in wrestling teams across the country. According to counts, in 1982 there were 363 NCAA wrestling teams with 7,914 wrestlers competing; in 2001, there were only 229 teams with fewer than 6,000 wrestlers. Yet, in the same period, the number of NCAA institutions increased from 787 to 1,049. In recent histo-

TITLE IX FEATURE

What Title IX means to the Bucknell community

As a former female athlete who benefited directly from Title IX, I feel strongly that Title IX is a good law. Certainly the opportunities now available to women are remarkable in number and in quality. As it is written, the law serves as a great equalizer between the sexes. However, the interpretation of this law often serves to take opportunities away from very deserving athletes.

As a woman and an athlete, I do not support female athletics, I support ATHLETICS. And to take away opportunities for some (male) athletes is not in the spirit of the law. Current discrepancies in opportunities and respect do not occur because of gender differences but because of sport preferences and commercialism.

Overall, the benefits of this law greatly outweigh the negative consequences. The application of this law to other educational programs will continue to grow. Instead of hanging the law itself, I would prefer for administrators and policy makers everywhere to evaluate their position about the law.

—Shannon Ellis, graduate assistant volleyball coach

Title IX is the most lenient of all nondiscrimination laws. Bucknell, I feel, has used Title IX as a scapegoat to cut the costs and therefore the men's wrestling team. It seems ironic to me that the new athletic facilities were being constructed the same time the wrestling team was getting eliminated. Maybe if a portion of the money for the new athletic facility was allocated to saving the wrestling program Title IX's credibility would not have been dragged through the mud.

—Jen Mellon '04

In this period of conservative reactionary politics all forms of affirmative action are under serious attack, including Title IX. Title IX marked a huge advance for women and must be defended at all costs. But defense strategy must go beyond focusing exclusively on funding.

In order for Title IX to be effective we must begin using it as a means to breakdown prescriptive gender roles in sport by making nontraditional sports available for both sexes and actively encouraging participation in those sports. For example, instead of discontinuing men's wrestling, Title IX might have been used to initiate women's collegiate wrestling at Bucknell. It is crucial to note that while Title IX action will affect both women and men, all decisions must be based on the current conditions of women in sports since they are the disenfranchised group.

Bucknell, along with other universities and educational institutions, have a responsibility to lead the way toward breaking down these prescriptions by encouraging women and men to participate in sports which are traditionally considered masculine or feminine, respectively. Title IX has the potential to be an impetus toward sports participation no longer being prescribed by sex. But this would require an enormous effort from a vanguard of high schools and universities. Is Bucknell ready to be a part of that vanguard?

—Laura Kamienski, Athletics and Recreation SS

I believe Title IX was a great law when it was written. However, the wording of Title IX has begun to harm the values it once stood for. I am a female athlete and Title IX has taken away my opportunity to participate in the sport I love. I have been wrestling since sixth grade. I even wrestled on the varsity team at Bucknell last year, but according to Bucknell and the NCAA I was classified as a male when calculating the numbers. And now I no longer have the opportunity to participate in a sport I love and I have lost a part of myself.

Title IX was written to grant opportunities, not to take them away. It is completely unfair for men (and women) to be losing the opportunities just so the numbers look good. As sad as it may sound, the average number of women wishing to participate in athletics is lower than the average number of men. And for this simple reason men will continue to be harmed.

When Title IX was written the effects were overwhelming. They were amazing and without this law I don't think I could be where I am today. But if the trend we are on now continues the negative effects will eventually outweigh the positive ones we already have. A big problem is that no girl's sport can compete with the numbers of participants and funding giving that football has. Because of this other teams are suffering. Wresting had only 13 team members and minimal funding ... but somehow this is how we can now comply with Title IX. Title IX has been a huge part of my life both positively and negatively. The solution is not to eliminate Title IX, but to amend and update it so nobody is punished.

—Jenny Perrin '05

As written, Title IX does not mandate that men's sports or programs be dropped in favor of adding sports for women. The legislation bars discrimination based on sex—it does not specify which sex. The challenge in a situation of inequity is to create opportunities for the underrepresented gender without eliminating opportunities for the overrepresented gender. Without a financial windfall, there is no easy way for this to happen. Ultimately, it is unfortunate that men's sports have been lost; but, it is not a direct result of Title IX. The rhetoric surrounding the perception of reverse discrimination is based on the argument against it is that many men's programs in universities across the country have been dropped as a result. However, it's only fair that women have access to the same funding that men's sports have enjoyed. It is not a perfect system, but any measure, like Title IX or affirmative action, working to correct inequalities that have long been perpetuated by different systems is a step in the right direction.

Much of the controversy of Title IX focuses on the way in which the law is implemented. If the guidelines took more into account women's satisfaction with athletic opportunities on campus, and focused less on gender equivalency in various sports, I think much of the opposition of this title would be eliminated. However, it is the not the opposition of this title that poses the biggest threat to it, it is the apathy for it. Many opponents of Title IX are very vocal about their opposition, while many people who approve of the law have less of a reason to be "up in arms" about it, so to speak. Despite its flaws, Title IX is vital to ensuring equality for women and, especially, women athletes.

interpretations and application of the statue at the level of the Office of Civil Rights.

Yes, Title IX has been immensely effective in achieving progress toward gender equity for girls and women in sport. Since 1972, the participation of girls and women in sport at the high school level has increased more than 800 percent and more than 400 percent at the college levels. Beyond participation rates, Title IX opened the door for women to earn scholarships for athletics at the college level. Championships for women's sports are a direct result of Title IX, as is the high percentage of women coaching women, and the high level of skill we have the pleasure to watch. Without Title IX, the talent of these girls and women would never have been developed. Further, and perhaps more importantly, the well-being of women and girls is enhanced with opportunities in athletics—self-esteem, confidence, self-efficacy, leadership qualities and perceptions of body image are higher; rates of depression, suicide, high risk behaviors and risk of breast cancer are lower.

administration, there is much to be learned by looking back at where the law actually came from.

The Nixon Administration (1969-1974)

In 1972, President Richard Nixon began the history of Title IX with the stroke of a pen. On June 23, he signed the Education Amendments into law after Congress sent him the legislation. The law came out of the increased desire to see gender inequity in education lessened and eventually removed from the system.

Not long after the law was signed, the NCAA began the process of changing its rules. According to its Web site, "In 1973, on the advice of legal council, the NCAA rescinded its rule prohibiting female student-athletes from competing for NCAA championships. That same year, Dacia Schileru, a diver from Wayne State University (Michigan), became the first female to compete in an NCAA championship when she entered the College Division Swimming and Diving Championships."

The Ford Administration (1974-1977)

During the Ford Administration, Congress was very busily debating legislation to amendment Title IX.

Opposition came from the NCAA. According to its records, "President John Fuzak of Michigan State University, wrote to President Ford, stating that, 'The Department of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW) concepts of Title IX as expressed could seriously damage, if not destroy, the major men's intercollegiate athletic programs.'"

Signed by Ford and effective on July 7, 1975, the new law included language that would prohibit sex discrimination in athletics and gave educational institutions a three-year window to comply with the new regulations.

The Carter Administration (1977-1981)

Policy regarding Title IX once again changed in 1978 under President Carter's administration when HEW issued a document entitled "Title IX and Intercollegiate Athletics" for comment in Congress. The policy presumed that collegiate athletic compliance to the law was based on equal average per capita expenditures for men's and women's athletics.

Later, on Dec. 11, 1979, the final policy was signed. In its final form, the law focused on an institution's obligation to provide for equal opportunity for men and women as determined by the "Three Prong Test" still used today.

The Reagan Administration (1981-1989)

It was during the Reagan administration that Title IX went through some of its most vigorous opposition. According to a 1982 New York Times piece, "Despite the progress since the enactment of the Title IX legislation, there is concern among some female officials and athletes over the uneven enforcement of the law and a series of conflicting court interpretations of the law's intent."

It was during the Reagan administration that Title IX went through some of its most vigorous opposition. According to a 1982 New York Times piece, "Despite the progress since the enactment of the Title IX legislation, there is concern among some female officials and athletes over the uneven enforcement of the law and a series of conflicting court interpretations of the law's intent."

Perhaps the most controversial event for Title IX legislation came in 1984 when the Supreme Court issued its ruling on the Grove City case. According to the NCAA, "Those who wanted to limit the scope of Title IX won a major victory when the Supreme Court ruled that Title IX did apply to Grove City (through its students receiving federal aid) but that Title IX only applied to those departments that actually received the funds. That narrow interpretation effectively denied the application of Title IX to non-federally funded programs such as college athletics departments."

As the NCAA points out, the debate was not yet over. "In 1988, Congress enacted the Civil Rights Restoration Act, requiring that all educational institutions that receive either direct or indirect federal funds to be subject to Title IX. That act restored the power of Title IX and caused the Association, as well as its member institutions, to rethink Title IX and its impact yet again."

It became law on March 22, 1988, only after Congress overrode the veto President Ronald Reagan imposed on the legislation.

The George H. W. Bush Administration (1989-1993)

Events during the first Bush's administration began to push Title IX into the mainstream. On April 2, 1990, the Office of Civil Rights of the Department of Education (DOE) published a manual detailing the steps necessitated in investigating any violations of Title IX. Authored by Valerie M. Bonnette and Lamar Daniel, the manual expressed the serious nature with which the DOE intended to take the law.

The Clinton Administration (1993-2001)

Title IX began to take its present-day form shortly after the Clinton administration took office. The Equity in Athletics Disclosure Act of 1994 required a full disclosure program for any coeducational higher education institution taking part in any federal student financial aid program while maintaining an intercollegiate athletics program. The law mandated that these disclosures be made yearly and that they begin on Oct. 1, 1996.

Where has it gotten us?

There have been many studies performed by organizations in favor of and against the basic tenets of Title IX. As you would imagine, their findings are always debated. Even through there are so many sources of statistics, the numbers do show some important trends.

Title IX has increased the ability of women's sports programs to compete on a level with that of men's sports. There are now more women participating than ever before and there is more money in women's athletics than ever before. Whether there will ever be total equality remains to be seen. The history of Title IX will be seen in the athletic programs across the country for years to come and its legacy will only be determined with the current events presented to us.

—Much of the framework for this article came from a study done by the University of Iowa. Also, the National Women's Law Center provided for much of the data, as did the NCAA.

try, schools such as Bucknell and Marquette joined the growing list of wrestling program demises, despite being supported entirely by a booster program outside of the university budgets.

Examining these findings and many others, the commission set forth many recommendations to be delivered to Paige later this month, including one that states: "The Office of Civil Rights should allow institutions to conduct interest surveys as a way of demonstrating compliance with the three part test." Not necessarily meant as a change, this proposal might strengthen schools' use and awareness of the third part of the test.

Other important recommendations by the commission included one that would change how participation is measured in sports. This would be done by setting a number of roster spots for each team and enabling schools to establish budgets based on these numbers. The commission suggested not counting walk-ons to teams, or those students who do not receive scholarships to play their respective sports.

Much of the commission's work was also criticized. Women's rights groups say that the commission's proposals may contribute to a loss in opportunity rather than a continued growth. They argue that the commission did not discuss fixing the discrimination that still exists against women.

"This is just about predetermining the amount of discrimination we're going to practice," said Christine A. Grant, former women's athletic director at the University of Iowa. "If this goes through, in perpetuity women are going to be underrepresented, underprivileged, and I can never support that."

One of the commission's votes was left openended, ending in a 7-7 tie because of the absence of a member who was serving on another panel at the time of the vote.

Debbie Yow, the athletics director at the University of Maryland, had suggested that schools split the number of spots on sports teams 50-50 between men and women with a margin of 2-3 percentage points of fluctuation.

Currently, women make up 56 percent of undergraduate enrollment, while only making up 42 percent of athletes. This would serve to ease the need of colleges to cut so many men's athletics teams, while allowing equal participation opportunity. Even though the proposal did not pass, it will be in the final report to Paige, just without the commission's formal backing.

The commission on Opportunity in Athletics concluded formal meetings at the end of January with a message to schools: cutting men's teams to achieve equality is "not a favored practice."

The commission's work was riddled by speculation that many of the witnesses who came before the commission were against the law, concern that 10 of the 15 members of the commission were pulled from Division I-A universities and rumor that some commission members said they did not have enough information to make informed votes.

Echoing the goals and prospects of the commission's work was Ted Leland, athletics director at Stanford University.

" ... We are ... the first shot out of the cannon," Leland said. "We've made it OK to talk about Title IX enforcement. That's all we've done."

Men defeat Lehigh in last dual meet

Bison swimmers end the regular season with a record of 4-2 and now look ahead to the Patriot League Championships

The University men's swimming and diving team beat the Lehigh Mountain Hawks 157-143 in its final dual meet of the season last Saturday.

Before the races started, there was a celebration for the seven seniors on the team. The meet against Lehigh was the last regular season meet for Gonzalo Diaz, Christopher Feinthel, Michael Guskey, Geoffrey Konopka, Kurt McCoy, Stelios Saffos and Stephen Schwanhausser.

Adam Freeman '04 performs a dive at the Lehigh meet. Freeman easily earned the gold medals in both the one- and three-meter diving events. In the one-meter competition, Freeman set a new school record with a total of 291.22 points, 94.13 points above the 2nd-place diver.

"In general, the Lehigh meet was a monumental victory for the men's swim team. Our team really came together and rose to the occasion," diver Adam Freeman '05 said.

The men won the first two events. The 200-meter medley relay team of Mark Kretzer '06, Guskey, Peter Garvin '04 and Michael Willats '04 finished in 1 minute, 35.88 seconds. McCoy was victorious in the 1,000 freestyle in 9:52.11.

In both the 200 freestyle and the 100 backstroke, the Bison were able to capture 3rd and 4th place finishes, respectively. Todd Bauer '06 (1:45.79) and Matt Hallowell '04 (1:48.15) swam the 200 freestyle, and Feinthel (:54.94) and Michael Harrigan '04 (:55.45) swam the 100 backstroke.

The team was able to regain its momentum in the 100 breast stroke. Guskey (:58.23), Saffos (:59.30) and Schwanhausser (:59.73) swept the event. Kretzer gained another 1st-place finish for the team and for himself in the 200 butterfly with a time of 1:56.32.

The sprint events, the 50 and 100 freestyles, saw Bucknell capture two 2nd-place finishes by Garvin in :21.52 and :47.53, respectively.

In the next three events, the 1st-place times were recorded. Feinthel won the 200 backstroke in 1:57.37. William Schilling '06 swam a 2:07.81 in the 200 breast stroke, placing him third on the Bucknell all-time charts in that event. Bauer captured the gold in the 500 freestyle in 4:45.79.

Important points were added in the last two individual events of the meet. The Bison went 2, 3, 4 in the 100 butterfly with good performances by Kretzer (:52.84), Harrigan (:53.72) and Dean Deluca (:54.06). Hallowell placed 2nd in the 200 individual medley in 1:59.57.

"After stellar performances across the board, the meet was very close and came down to the last relay," Freeman said.

The winner of the meet was decided in the final event of the day, the 400 freestyle relay. Bucknell placed 1st and 4th in the race. The 1st place team of Jake Thieman '05, Harrigan, Willats and Garvin turned in good performances, finishing in 3:10.48. Brian Cole '06, Deluca, Saffos and Guskey all swam well, solidifying the win with a 4th-place finish in 3:16.03.

The diving team also contributed in winning the meet. Freeman won both the one-meter and three-meter events. He received 291.22 points in the one-meter and 260.92 in the three-meter. In the three-meter, he crushed his competition by scoring 52 more points than the 2nd-place finisher. Freeman's performance placed him seventh on the all-time charts in the three-meter.

"I believe that this win was essential in bringing the men's team together and giving us the confident mentality that we need to succeed in the Patriot League Championships," Freeman said.

The Bucknell men's team ended the season with a record of 4-2. It now looks ahead to the Patriot League Championships, which Lehigh won last year. They will be held Feb. 20-22 in the Kinney Natatorium.

Creamer becomes overall all-time leading scorer rest of the game. Creamer connected on a huge three and then scored 11 unanswered points over the next six minutes to keep Bucknell within striking distance. The defense forced Colgate into 17 second-half turnovers and Creamer, Kate Franks '03 and company converted them into 21 points.

The Bison took their first lead of the game, 54-53, on a pair of free throws by Creamer with 6:47 left. Franks drained a huge three that gave Bucknell a four-point advantage heading into the final stretch. The Orange and Blue defense created three Colgate turnovers in the final two minutes and scored seven of the last nine points of the game for a 70-62 victory.

Creamer achieved another milestone as her 37 points set a new record for most points scored in a game by a female in Colgate's Cotterell Court. All-Patriot League candidate Franks had an outstanding game with 17 points and eight rebounds.

Bucknell hopped on a bus and drove to Holy Cross Feb. 2 in a rematch of last year's Patriot League Championship game. Without the luxuries of rest or recovery time the Bison could not repeat last year's monumental victory and fell to the Crusaders 86-76.

The Orange and Blue battled the Crusaders hard in the first half with neither team able to extend a lead past seven points. The Bison stormed out of the gate with an 11-7 lead, stunning the hostile crowd. Holy Cross quickly tied the game at 13 and then sprinted out to a 22-15 lead with 8:15 left in the half. Lindsey Geosits '06 continued her impressive season by knocking down a big three-pointer to pull the Bison within two, 24-22.

The Crusaders tried to put the game away toward the end of the half with an 11-3 spurt, but Bucknell fought hard and trailed by only six at the half, 39-33.

"Lindsey has been starting since game one and I forget that she is a freshman when she is out there playing," Creamer said. "They [the freshmen] are all doing such a great job. I am really proud of all of them."

Holy Cross exploited a fatigued Bison squad with a 10-2 run over the first five minutes of the half to build a 14-point lead. The Holy Cross offense pounded the ball inside, wearing down the Bison defense and building an 18-point cushion with just under 10 minutes left. The Orange and Blue offense continued to struggle. Bucknell's exhaustion was apparent in its free-throw shooting as they struggled to keep focus and uncharacteristically missed many scoring chances.

The Bison continued to dig deep within and refused to give in to fatigue, or the Crusaders, as they mounted one last comeback. They followed a four-minute scoring drought from the field by converting 11 straight foul shots to pull within 10, 67-57. Creamer fought hard for open shots and continued to draw fouls, creating precious points for Bucknell and closing the gap to 79-72 with under three minutes left. Holy Cross shot a surreal 65 percent from the floor in the second half and converted seven free throws in the closing minutes to forge an 86-76 victory.

Creamer assaulted the record books as her 33 points made her the Patriot League's overall (men or women) all-time leading scorer and improved her scoring average to 27.5 points per contest, good enough to rank her first in the country in scoring. Unfortunately, the Orange and Blue lost the services of Franks to a hip injury with 11:47 left in the game. Geosits did a great job picking up the slack as she netted a career-high nine points to go with four assists and two steals.

"When Franks got hurt in the Cross game I knew I was going to have to step up as more of a scoring option," Geosits said. "Molly was going to get doubled a lot more and in those situations Franks or Des usually provide more of the offense, so without Franks we were down a major threat."

Bucknell continues its tough road trip with a 3:15 p.m. tilt against American on Feb. 8.

were turned into varsity-club programs. This way, athletes could still participate, but the numbers would not have to be added into the proportionality equation.

The plan was based on the recommendation of a 24-member committee that has spent the last two years studying ways the University can achieve proportionality. The plan also called for upgrading athletic facilities for women, adding at least one new full-time assistant coach or head coach for a women's sport and equalizing recruiting dollars for men's and women's teams.

With the elimination of the two men's teams as varsity sports, the University is much closer to the desired 51/49 percent for men and women, respectively.

"Though it wasn't the only part of the plan, our leading principle was to be substantially proportional," Vice President of Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 said.

While he feels the University is now much closer to reaching that goal, he said that there are still changes to be made in other areas such as funding and staffing.

Once again, the difference can be seen in the numbers. In 2001, the women's total share of operating expenses was 37 percent, the recruiting budget was 24 percent and the women's share of coaching budget was 36 percent. The school is working on making statistics such as these closer to 50 percent.

Though it seems the University still has a way to go in fully satisfying the requirements of Title IX, the school has come a long way. Some decisions the University has made have resulted in conflicts, debates and even lawsuits. Whether everyone agrees with Title IX or not, one fact continues to remain: It is the law, and the school has made a huge amount of progress since its introduction only 30 years ago.

Bucknell Connection: 300 Girl Scouts to earn merit badges with University students

By Meghan Ball
Features Editor

Three hundred Girl Scouts will flood Olin Science for "Bucknell Connection" tomorrow. This annual Circle K program invites Girl Scouts from the four-county area to spend a day earning merit badges.

This year's girls will be completing "Making it Matter," a merit badge focused on chemical, civic and mechanical engineering. The girls will take part in a series of activities planned by Circle K and two Girl Scout leaders.

"The goal for the day is to get the girls excited about engineering and encourage them to pursue interests in the sciences. It's a great opportunity for us and the community because it is such a joint effort between the University groups and the community," Bucknell Connection Chair Sarah Bongarten '06 said.

The Girl Scouts, ranging from third-grade Brownies through eighth-grade Juniors, will participate in six different activites. The girls will make polymer (a substance similar to Silly Putty), create a spinning top out of marbles to learn about ball bearings, builde a bridge out of newspaper and participate in several other activities. They will also listen to a speech by Assistant Professor of Chemical Engineering Margot Vigeant.

This will be the program's 10th year. It includes girls from Union, Montour, North Umberland and Snyder counties.

"We are extremely pleased and grateful that Circle K has continued year after year to commit to this program. Its success hinges on the energy and enthusiasm of Bucknell students," said Ann Arney, the Girl Scout leader who started the program.

While the program was planned by Circle K, Alpha Phi Omega Fraternity, Chi Omega Sorority, the Society of Women Engineers and Catholic Campus Ministries will also be volunteering at the event.

The Girl Scouts will be broken up into groups of 30. Each group will have four to five volunteers leading them from station to station. In addition, each station has a leader will have a leader running the activity. Nicole Lynn '03 feels that the volunteers serve as role models.

"The Girl Scout project is a good way for students to interact with children from the surrounding area. The girls come here and look up to college students; we become their role models for the day," Lynn said. "It's a great experience for both the Girl Scouts and the students."

Circle K is an on-campus group that does community service activities. "Bucknell Connection" is one of its largest events. They meet on Sundays at 7 p.m. The public is invited to stop by in Olin Science tomorrow beginning at 8 a.m. to see the Girl Scout program.

Visiting Poet: Pit Menousek Pinegar

By Caitlin McKee
Staff Writer

Pit Menousek Pinegar, the University's visiting poet, is no stranger to campus. She graduated from the University in 1963 with a bachelor's degree in English, and she has gone on to establish a successful career as a multimedia artist. Pinegar summed up her return to the University in three words.

"It's just fun," Pinegar said.

Her role as visiting poet marks her seventh time returning to campus. In past years, Pinegar has given a Capstone lecture on creativity and worked with creative writing classes. She also spent a month in the summer at the University's Poet Cottage. For Pinegar, the University's friendly vibe is what keeps her coming back.

"The reason I first came to Bucknell is because it was a really friendly place, and it still is. It's so much fun every time I come back, it never occurs to me not to," Pinegar said.

During the first part of her residency, which ran from Jan. 28-31, Pinegar gave a lecture titled "A Funny Thing Happens on the Way to the Form: The Adventures of a Multi-Genre Writer." She also met with senior and first-year creative writing classes. Pinegar worked with student writers on developing ideas and structure.

"The exercise is designed to find out what did the students want to write about and what form that idea will take, whether it be an essay, a poem or prose," Pinegar said.

Pinegar will return to campus for the second part of her residency on March 4. She is looking forward to reuniting with the student writers to discuss the development of their work.

"It is exciting to know I will recognize people and see their revisions," Pinegar said.

During her next visit, Pinegar also plans to give a reading of her own material and work with opera students on character development.

As an artist of all trades, Pinegar has a lot to offer the University's aspiring artists. Name a genre of art, and she has experience in it. She is the author of two published books of poetry and has just finished the manuscript of a third.

Pinegar has published essays, staged a piece of performance art and is also a photographer. Currently, she is writing poetry to go along with her photographs of various literary figures.

Pinegar said she is always working on a project. The type of project often depends on her schedule.

"Poetry is a day-to-day, regular thing I can do in life. But if someone gives me a big space of time, I like nothing better than to drop into a piece of long fiction," Pinegar said.

The artist said she is inspired by the different relationships humans have in the world.

"I write a lot about relationships. I'm not sure of anything I've ever written that does not have to do with relationships. Just being in the world and what that means from moment to moment, sometimes it's about citizenship, sometimes it's about nature, sometimes it's about the form love takes," Pinegar said.

Pinegar believes the liberal arts education she received from the University provided her with the professional freedom necessary to establish the versatile career she enjoys today.

"I left Bucknell not with a profession, as most parents expect. I left here with a solid liberal arts education that let me do anything I want. I have a varied career that I am extremely happy with and I do not know if I would have it had I had some other kind of education," Pinegar said.

International students fight for visas

By Ashley Maliken
Staff Writer

In the post Sept. 11 world, life isn't as simple as it once was. Though the terrorist attacks may have unified our nation, internationally there is a river of distrust that runs very deep. While this presents much turmoil in the political spectrum, it has much farther reaching effects than many realize. For one student here, Yew San Lim '06 of Malaysia, those effects are apparent every time he looks around the University. Lim, after being accepted early decision to the University, spent endless weeks applying for his visa in order to begin studies only to be repeatedly denied.

Prior to Sept. 11, the application process for a visa took only a month. Understanding the many difficulties he could face, both as an international student and a male, Lim sent his application in during June of 2002, nearly three months before his scheduled departure for the United States. Though he expected to get his visa without hassle, as he had no reason to be denied—his sister and parents had both studied in the United States without trouble, he played it safe. His hunch proved correct, for a few weeks later he received a letter saying that his application could not be processed and he should wait until he was contacted before applying again. There was no reason given for his rejection, just that he was denied.

"We were still quite hopeful," Lim said. "I got an e-mail not much later saying I could send my application in again, and so I did."

After sending his application in for a second time, Lim was once again denied. His unprocessed application was returned with instructions to wait for further notice before applying again. Once again there was no explanation, and by this point it was too late for Lim to begin his first semester at the University. Lim didn't stop trying, and instead remained productive while in Malaysia. He took classes at home in order to acquire some college credits, all the while waiting until he got notice to reapply for his visa.

> "[The visa] was a perfect Christmas present. I picked it up the day after Christmas."
> —Yew San Lim '06*

Finally word came, so Lim sent in his application one last time. Then, two days before Christmas, he received a telephone call telling him that his application had been accepted and he was to report to the capital city of Kuala Lumpur and pick up his visa. He never received any details about why he was repeatedly denied, but his excitement at finally being granted a visa overshadowed his desire for an explanation.

"It was a perfect Christmas present. I picked it up the day after Christmas," Lim said.

At the start of the spring semester Lim officially enrolled as a first-year mechanical engineering student at the University. Lim is behind in some of his requirements because of the semester he missed. One session this summer and the credits from his courses back home will be enough to ensure his graduation with the Class of 2006. The visa he was finally granted lasts for four and a half years, so his tenure here will not be plagued with worries of being sent home.

Though Lim's story has a happy ending, there are many other students here experiencing similar problems with no apparent end in sight. The Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) has recently instituted a new policy called "special registration" that requires international students to register and check in regularly with its office in Philadelphia. They are fingerprinted, identified in a photo directory and forced to check in with the status and progress of the education.

Current students at the University were not affected by this law until Dec. 18, while students were away on winter break, Pakistan and Saudi Arabia were added to the list of countries requiring documentation. In a few days affected students will travel to Philadelphia and start what will become a monthly task for the rest of their time in the United States. This special registration process, in addition to the risk of having their visas revoked, is enough to make many students afraid to go home.

"I have decided that I can't go home until I graduate because I am afraid that if I go home and apply for a new visa, I won't get it. I really want to get my degree and go home, making it very frustrating," Khalid Alghamdi '05 said. He was one of the students at the University to experience the new INS program, spending nine hours in the airport until he was registered.

Sept. 11 has caused problems nationwide, many of which the University was sheltered from in the protective bubble that is college life. With each passing day more and more people feel the effects and will continue to do so until they reach graduation. That is, if the INS allows them to stay here that long.

Abroad Perspective: field studies in Kenya

By Sarah Gudenkauf
Senior Writer

My 10 favorite questions that I was asked after a semester in Africa and their short answers:

1. You went where?!? Kenya.

2. Why would you go there? Where else would be cooler? I wanted to go someplace where I could study both fascinating culture and wildlife.

3. What did you do there? I took classes and did a research project.

4. Did you live in a hut? That depends on your frame of reference.

5. Was it really hot? Not all of the time. Actually, at night it could be quite cool.

6. Did you see any animals? Yes, I was studying wildlife management.

7. Did you get to pet a lion? Um, no, you don't really pet the wildlife.

8. Did you shower? Yes, but since the water was cold I tried not to shower too often.

9. Do you have any diseases? No, although I guess that would make for a better story.

10. Do you speak/hum that language, with the sounds, from that movie? I think you mean "The Gods Must Be Crazy." That language is Click, and, NO, I don't speak it. But I did pick up a little Swahili.

Bonus question: How was it? Indescribably wonderful.

Those are the short answers. During fall semester 2002 I participated in the School for Field Studies: Center for Wildlife Management Studies, Kenya program (SFS, CWMS). There were 43 students divided between two sites; my group consisted of 22 students who were all wonderful. It was, as I mentioned before, indescribably wonderful, but I will now attempt to do so anyway.

SFS had two sites, each fully equipped with a large local and international staff, bandas (our cabins), a kitchen, dining area/classroom and running water for sinks and outdoor bathrooms.

I spent the first half of the semester at the site in Kenya's capital, Kitengela, a few miles south of Nairobi, approximately 1 degree south of the Equator. I spent the second half of the semester four hours south of Nairobi at the site in the Kijiado District. Mount Kilimanjaro in Tanzania could be seen very clearly rising above our camp.

We had a midsemester break before switching sites where we were able to travel around Kenya. I spent my break on an island off the northern coast in the Indian Ocean called Lamu, but that is another story.

While at SFS we took four wonderful courses: wildlife management, ecology, socioeconomic/environmental policy and directed research. We were able to apply lectures from our African professors, who are experts in their field, directly to our environment. The program was perfect for me, as an animal behavior major and African studies minor.

Many field lectures took place in Nairobi National Park or Amboseli National Park. There we did grass species surveys or game counts—that is, counting the number of zebra, wildebeest, elephants and many other species, or speaking to people in the local community about human-wildlife issues. We also went on two camping expeditions in the Maasai Mara National Reserve and Tsavo West National Park. In early November we took our final examinations for three courses so that we could spend the next month concentrating on our directed research projects, which was by far one of the best experiences I had while in Kenya.

I worked with seven other students mapping fences in the Kajiado district and interviewing over 200 people who live in the area about their experiences with human-wildlife conflict. The interviews were a wonderful experience. We met many amazing people and even had a chance to practice our Swahili.

After we finished our fieldwork, we spent almost all of our time at the center writing our results. The finished analysis of our results, including the maps we made, is something that I am very proud of. After we finished our papers, we then made a presentation to the community. We were able to have open dialogue about our findings and possible solutions with community leaders and a portion of the people who we had interviewed for our research.

The other question that people always ask me is if I have any good stories. So, assuming that Bucknellian readers want to hear the stories as well, I will attempt to convey some of my best.

A few weeks into the program we went to the elephant orphanage attached to Nairobi National Park. The sanctuary is for young elephants whose mothers have died, usually as a result of poaching for the ivory trade.

There were several elephants at the orphanage, varying in age; some were as old as 5-6 years. The oldest elephants would soon be transported to other national parks in Kenya where they would be introduced into an established elephant herd. We also got to see the orphanage's newest arrival, a very young female elephant. She was only 5 days old. Her skin was still soft and she stood about to about midthigh height.

A little over halfway through the semester we went on an expedition in Tsavo West National Park. We camped in small tents, did field exercises and listened to quest lectures from park managers. At night we had Kenyan Wildlife Services askaris (guards) to make sure that we were safe from being stepped on by an elephant or that a herd of buffalo didn't wander through our campground.

On the second night one of the girls in our group left her tent to go to the bathroom. While she was outside the tent, she saw a large male lion run past her on the road into camp, and she dove back into her tent. A few moments later she and her tentmates saw the silhouette of a lion circle their tent and another lion chewing on one professor's tent.

Top: Students play with local preschool children. The students made improvements to the school house for a community service project. Middle: Elephants at the elephant orphanage in Nairobi National Park. Bottom: Zebras in Nairobi National Park, taken during a game count.

The askaris noticed, as did some other staff members. They soon surrounded the tents with our land cruiser, all the headlights turned on so that they could see the lions. The lions were roaring and the askaris fired four shots into the air to try to encourage the lions to leave. Eventually the lions wandered back out of camp.

No harm done other than some teeth marks in a few tents and a destroyed bucket that young lions had played with. I slept through the entire event! I didn't even wake up once, not for the roaring or the gunshots—to think I missed all that!

But I was not the only one. Five other people also slept through it and the entire event was rehashed for us in detail by our incredulous fellow students and staff.

The comment was made that it is evolutionally maladaptive to sleep though gunshots, but I like to think that it is actually a good trait: I am definitely able to sleep no matter the circumstances.

When the rainy season comes in Kenya, all the previously dusty roads turn to mud and very often into little rivers. On the second day of interviews for our directed research, the roads did precisely this. It had been raining heavily in the afternoon for a couple of days. The day before we had used the winch built into the front of our land cruiser's frame to pull us out of the mud. This day was particularly bad; it took us over four hours to get home, which was only about 15 miles away. We spent much of that time pushing our vehicle and other stuck vehicles that we came across.

At one point we even had to build a bridge out of large rocks over an already existing creek so that our truck and another truck blocking the way could get across. They promptly got stuck on the other side, but we got them across and then we were able to dismantle our bridge to use under the tires of the newly stuck vehicles.

The most exciting part of the afternoon came later. What had been the road we had used to get to our study site that morning was now narrowing as two creeks came closer and closer on either side.

Eventually our truck couldn't stay on the road, which was coming to a point in front of us where the two creeks joined. Unfortunately for us, the creeks were deeper than we had anticipated and our truck tipped over sideways into one of them. I had always wondered what it would be like to climb out of a car that had rolled and now I know.

By the time all of us got out of the truck, it was well and truly stuck. We tried using the winch to pull us out, but this didn't work. So we called for back-up from our campsite where the mechanic said he was on his way with another vehicle to pull us out. Unfortunately, the bridge outside of our camp was flooded and he couldn't get to us.

So, we debated trying to walk home and spent much of our time trying in vain to push our truck upright and dreaming about being dry and clean. At this point, we were soaked through and muddy from head to foot. Locals who came to help said that we were truly Africans now because our skin was no longer white.

After a long debate, we decided to walk home. It was after dark, so walking was discouraged because there were many animals in the area. Once we were on our way, however, we realized that we had not been that far away from camp after all, and within an hour and a half we were back at camp, working on the goal of being clean and dry.

Soon after we were exhausted, but eating dinner and regaling everybody else with our adventure. The clothes we were wearing never did become clean, but the truck was rescued and the next day we went out to do interviews again.

I, of course, can't even begin to tell all the exciting, humorous and memorable stories from my time abroad. There are so many more, and, thanks to my digital camera, roughly 1,000 pictures to illustrate them. If more stories are to be heard, they will have to be told in person, and I hope to remember new ones to tell every day.

San Jose Taiko drums a new beat

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

"Rhythm Journey Tour 2003" performs a drum routine at the Weis Center last Saturday. San Jose Taiko has influenced Japanese drumming methods for over 20 years.

BY JOSH HERWITT
Staff Writer

The Weis Center for the Performing Arts held its first-ever percussion ensemble concert on campus last Saturday. Eight members (Michelle Fujii, PJ Hirabayashi, Franco Imperial, Yumi Ishihara, Janet Koike, Stewart Kume, Meg Suzuki and Trish Wong) of San Jose Taiko performed their "Rhythm Journey Tour 2003" in one of several concerts in this year's Weis Center Performance Series.

Loud, lasting booms and short, colorful crashes fused with playful choreography to capture the eyes of students, faculty and members of the Lewisburg community in attendance. The audience was amazed by the composition and multiple rhythms of this unfamiliar Japanese art form, which is performed on the taiko drum.

Influenced by past Japanese drumming methods, San Jose Taiko has impressed viewers for 28 years. Now directed by Roy and PJ Hirayhashi, members of the ensemble write and arrange all of their work. Although most of the pieces consist of taiko drumming,other instruments used during the performance include a bamboo flute, gongs, cowbells and other percussion instruments from all over the world.

The concert consisted of 15 songs with an intermission splitting the first and second halves. Compelling pieces included "Gendai ni Ikiru," a combination of traditional taiko rhythms with modern jazz rhythms and the Cuban influence displayed in "Rumbako." Overall, the concert received great praise from the audience.

"I thought the concert was excellent," Visiting Assistant Professor of Anthropology and Sociology Edmund Searles said. "I was impressed with the energy of the performers, as well as their synchronicity. I was mesmerized by the rhythms and the precise choreography of the performers—it was thoroughly entertaining. I think these kinds of performances really showcase how special the Weis Center really is."

Students were also fascinated with this 30-year-old art form—multiple rhythms combining to create one overlying sound—and the Japanese culture and history demonstrated through the use of the taiko drum.

"It was intense. It wasn't each individual part, such as the drumming, rhythms, sound and mood, but rather the collaboration of them all," Ben Trump '06 said. "I am unsure about the level of skill required to play the taiko, but they obviously showed the mastery of taiko drumming through toilsome practice. Each piece seemed to fit its title and subject and showed the history and meaning of taiko."

The art of taiko drumming was very symbolic for the Japanese many years ago, and the members of San Jose Taiko continue to instill significant ideas into their drumming. Such beliefs incorporated into their drumming are beauties and harmonies of the human spirit, as well as individual respect due to the heavy influence of martial arts in Japan.

Not only is the thematic significance of taiko drumming amazing, but its physical strain on the body is well-deserving of praise. The traditional hand strokes and stances of the taiko drummers require a great deal of endurance and strength. Many of the members of San Jose Taiko have spent many years dedicating themselves to perfecting their skills through other forms of percussion.

"I thought the group displayed the kind of enthusiasm and energy I have witnessed in Taiko performances by East Coast groups," Professor of Anthropology and East Asian Studies Paul Noguchi said.

A friend of one of the performs, Noguchi knows how strenuous performing can be.

"Each one of the drummers was in great physical condition. I was delighted to discover that PJ, one of the performers, knew many of the people I grew up with in my hometown in New Jersey that are now participating in taiko," Noguchi said. One of the things I kept telling people I spoke with in the audience is that if one is not aerobically conditioned for the long haul, one does not last long performing a taiko piece. With continuous heavy drumming most of us would not even last a minute. Our arms would be burning."

With this new appreciation for the art of drumming, hopefully more Taiko groups and other percussion ensembles can perform on campus soon.

"Maybe in the future Bucknell can host a percussion festival with taiko as one of several types of drumming," Noguchi said.

Christina Aguilera strips down to a new image

LEAH CUNNINGHAM

Selling over 12 million copies worldwide, and gaining platinum status in 10 countries and gold status in 11 more, Christina Aguilera emerges with a personal and fearless album, "Stripped." Stripping away her teeny-bopper female artist in media struggle and angst image, Aguilera reforms into a confident, controlled woman taking charge of her own identity.

The album, written and produced largely on Aguilera's own, has made quite a name for her. Topping charts with her 1999 release of "Genie in a Bottle," "What a Girl Wants" and her other smash hit single, "Come On Over Baby," Aguilera's lyrics and songs phased pop-culture with the same overdone, over-rated and misconceived glamour as Britney Spears. Having previously joined forces with Pink, Mya and Lil' Kim in last year's smash "Lady Marmalade," Aguilera's talent became lost in the glitter media hype that she thought had given her the atypical cliche superstar image.

"I was straight ahead about what I wanted to do," Aguilera said, according to RCA Records. "For a long time, I'd been uncomfortable with the image that had been built around me and my music. It felt like I was pretending, trying to hide the real me and hurting instead because of it. This time I was determined to step beyond the hype. ... It was like starting all over again."

CD Review

Giving "Stripped" an independent, rebellious and even zealous appeal is its diverse mix, from her introductory ballad "Beautiful," to hip hop tailored, yet toned down beats including "Get Mine-Get Yours," "Dirrty" and "Can't Hold us Down" featuring Lil' Kim. Unseen in her earlier albums, Aguilera's passion dwells beneath the surface of her lyrics, as in "I am Okay," where she divulges adversity from her past and adds a more personal touch.

Of "I am Okay," Aquilera said in her interview for RCA Records, "It's the most personal song definitely. ...It was the hardest song I ever had to sing and write....It is a song about my past, with my father and what I had to go through. ... really hard, hard stuff... ."

"Stripped" is Aguilera's musical version of emotional revelations contrived from scrapbooks and journals along the way. Aguilera even said that in thinking about what exactly she wanted this album to convey, she continued writing down bits and pieces of songs and thoughts while on tour. This album is a segue into personal liberation, merging the thoughts and emotions of a young women in transition. Aguilera attempts what other artists have struggled with throughout history—the difficult task of redefining an already culturally masked and conditioned image through music. On a greater scale, perhaps Madonna's "Immaculate Collection" yields this same strife for reformation of a new persona, revealing the lost image, the whole self, a woman's confessional—honest and unguarded.

One conflicting issue left unaddressed is the clash of Aguilera's plea for true identity in her lyrics with her "half-stripped," highly sexualized and seductive image still dominating the album.

"I'm more interested in helping girls stand up for themselves. ...[the songs are about] double standards and how we're supposed to look and act a certain way just to please men. If I have any influence as an entertainer, I want it to be optimistic and uplifting. ..." Aguilera said she takes pride in this rekindled independence, self-confidence and the desire to strive away from succumbing to male pressure to fit the "perfect" woman norm, yet she continues to pose topless on the album cover.

Although "Stripped" continues to bare more and more of Aguilera's skin throughout the publicity of the album, the lyrics and message remain a powerful assertion of Aguilera's bold grasp of a new image as her musical talent reaches a new peak.

Farrell and "Recruit" awe female audiences

Colin Farrell arrives for premiere of "The Recruit" in Hollywood. The picture stars Al Pacino with Farrell and Bridget Moynahan.

Colin Farrell.

Need I say more for you to run to the very next showing of "The Recruit"? If for no other reason I would recommend this movie solely for the purpose of seeing his tattoo.

Of course other stars might appeal to you as well—such as Al Pacino or Bridget Moynahan, also seen in "Coyote Ugly" and "The Sum of all Fears." Whether you go to see the action or the actors, you can do nothing but applaud the acting skills.

Revolving around trust and betrayal within the CIA, "The Recruit" stunningly portrays the process of becoming an Ops Officer.

The story starts when James Clayton (Farrell), graduates at the top of his class at Massachusetts Institute of Technology and catches the eye of CIA recruiter, Burke (Pacino). Taken to "the Farm," a CIA training base, Clayton learns the ins and outs of being an agent. When he doesn't graduate from the program, the plot takes a dramatic twist.

Chock full of espionage and spy tactics, audience members need to be on top of their mental game. Similar to watching a show like "Alias," your mind always needs to be in tune with the details. And when you just can't figure out who's good and who's bad, the details are your only clues.

Besides the intense action and dramatic scenes, a complicated love story also emerges between Clayton and Layla (Moynahan). Between missions, counter-missions and tests, Layla and Clayton flirt their way to near disaster. In a situation where "everything is a test" and "you can't trust anyone," even love has a hard time winning in the end.

Though not entirely unpredictable, the plot did take a few unexpected turns. I'm going to have to disagree with the mediocre reviews of the critics—"The Recruit" is worth seeing.

Drama "Oleanna" opens tonight

BY KRISTEN HABACHT
Staff Writer

Ibby Cizmar '03 and Marc Powers '74 practice a scene from David Mamet's "Oleanna." The drama will be presented in Harvey Powers Theater in Coleman Hall tonight and tomorrow at 8 p.m.

David Mamet's "Oleanna," directed by Associate Professor of Theatre Robert Gainer, will be presented in Harvey Powers Theater in Coleman Hall tonight and tomorrow at 8 p.m. The production will showcase Senior Ibby Cizmar's acting recital and guest alumni actor and son of Harvey Powers, Marc Powers '74.

Often the term "controversial" causes a "theatergoer" to shy away from a production and the experience it provides, but the controversial themes, dialogue and relationships in "Oleanna" should produce exactly the opposite effect. David Mamet's view of society expressed in "Oleanna" is not only challenging toward social ideas, but is also thought provoking, entertaining and, for some, enlightening.

This provocative show experiments with the breaking of a social norm—a relationship between a student and a professor in a University environment. In a world where society and its values are found at a very superficial and face value assessment, "Oleanna" explores ideas and changes this point of view.

"The portrayal of their relationship turns into a fiendishly accurate X-ray of the mechanisms of power, censorship and abuse. It is impossible to see the play without wondering who, if anyone, is right," said one critic, according to the program.

The play allows the audience to see the flaws in both characters and allows them to take their own side.

With only eight days of rigorous rehearsal, Powers, a veteran actor and Professor of Theatre at the University of Alabama at Birmingham, and Cizmar, who has participated in many productions at the University, have enjoyed working on what Powers calls an "intense, interesting and at times frightening" production.

"It's been a lot of work and stress but it's been worth it," Cizmar said.

Besides coordinating rehearsal time with Powers for "Oleanna," Cizmar has also been acting as a director for "The Vagina Monologues."

Powers said that this has been an intense experience, but he and Cizmar are proud of the progress the production has made. The pair has appreciated the opportunity to explore the characters and themselves and hope to share their unique experience with audiences this weekend.

Giant moves ahead with building plans

Safety and environmental concerns surrounding a proposed Giant at the junction of Beagle Club Road and Route 15 have resulted in protests from the Lewsiburg community. Lighting for the 24-hour store may also affect the University observatory.

A proposed Giant supermarket at the junction of Beagle Club Road and Route 15 in East Buffalo Township has prompted safety and environmental concerns among members of the University and Lewisburg communities.

RVG Management and Development Company submitted its second sketch plan, which includes a 54,500 square foot Giant supermarket and a fueling station, and a land development plan, which outlines traffic and environmental conditions, to the East Buffalo Township zoning officer last month.

Resistance to the plan did not begin with these submissions though, but rather in the early stages of development last fall when community members first learned that a commercial developer was interested in the land that community members had previously thought was zoned only for residential development.

Members of the Rural Route Neighbors are principally concerned with the safety factors surrounding the development, chiefly the increase in traffic volume that is anticipated, both on Route 15 and the township roads west of Route 15.

Creamer leads nation in scoring

Basketball star excels on court, academically and as an inspiration to others

BY JOE SCHWEITZER
Staff Writer

How are sports heroes defined in our modern era? Are they people who celebrate their latest victory with arrogant celebrations or perhaps sign multi-year shoe company extensions? Everyone complains that sports has become commercialized, even hinting that players miss certain shots to purposely extend games for television stations and sponsors. While the world is alive with the sound (and sights) of greed, there still remains purity in little old Lewisburg, Pa. That purity is personified in Bucknell's own traditional sports hero, Molly Creamer.

Calling Creamer a sports hero is only a tip of the iceberg, as she is one of the most amazing people you will ever have the chance to meet. Just as there is no "I" in team, there is also no "I" in Cream(er). Creamer is described in the Bucknell women's basketball program as a "dynamic guard with great playmaking abilities and the ability to light up the crowd with exciting passes ... an entertaining player with a scorer's mentality." That little snapshot of what Creamer is only begins to describe this amazing individual.

In a time when big name stars are larger than life, Molly remains humble and well-grounded. She is the first one to deflect every ounce of credit she receives back to the players that she has stepped onto the court with and the coach who brought her here.

"I want to be remembered [at the University] as a team player who cared about her teammates more than anything," the two-time Patriot League Player of the Year said.

In fact, in all the interviews that have been conducted over the years involving "Mols," as her teammates call her, it would be impossible to find even a handful of responses that do not involve the deflection of her spotlight onto her teammates.

"I was interviewing Molly after one of her fantastic games," the voice of Bison basketball, Doug Birdsong, said. "She was just so humble during the interview. It seemed each time I tried to focus on what she did in the game, she always flipped it over to point out that her teammates were the ones who were getting her the ball in the position to score. I was so impressed with the way she liked to pass the praise along."

Creamer is an All-American and is leading the country in scoring, but she is also a loving daughter, sister, teammate, player and, most importantly, friend. In fact, the only awards that Creamer could ever adore are the kind words of her teammates. Instead of listing all of her mountainous accomplishments, it is more insightful to have the 2002-2003 Bucknell women's basketball squad share their awards or "Molly Moments" with the rest of the Lewisburg community.

"When I first met Mols she was a skinny, lanky junior in high school that looked like she should be in eighth grade," teammate Brooke Tomovich '05 said. "I never would have guessed that four years from then I would be blessed enough to play with such an amazing person."

Thankfully, Creamer did venture to Lewisburg to test the waters of college basketball. Creamer's high school successes at Mendham High School in New Jersey combined with her outstanding personality were a perfect fit for a Bison program that was still searching for an identity.

Birdsong knew there was something special about Creamer from the first time he met her.

"The first time I saw Molly, it was in Davis Gym, by herself, practicing," Birdsong said. "I remember talking with her for a few minutes and

University makes new housing plans for fall 2003

University housing will undergo some changes next year. Tower House will be populated by the Tau Kappa Epsilon (TKE) Fraternity, Kappa Sigma Fraternity may become a University dormitory, Bucknell West will once again house four students and the renovations to Vedder Hall will be complete.

"There will be some changes in the landscape next year," said Daniel Remley, assistant dean of students and director of housing and residential life.

According to Remley, TKE will be reclaiming its house.

"TKE's effort to recolonize has been successful and the men will be returning to their house, currently named Tower and occupied by the Arts [Residential College] Alumni," said Remley.

Kappa Sigma is in danger of losing its house for next year.

"The brothers of Kappa Sigma still have a few weeks remaining to recruit new members so that their active membership exceeds the minimal number required (80 percent of the house's capacity)," Remley said. "Failure to do so will result in the forfeiture of the house to the University and the brothers will reside elsewhere, but will still be recognized by the University as an active chapter."

Although there were rumors that Chi Phi fraternity might not have enough members to keep its house, the University cannot decide the house's fate.

"Chi Phi is a non-University owned property, and as such, the decision to continue rests with their chapter and alumni, not the University," Remley said.

Black History Alive and kicking

Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

Participants in Black History Alive took on the rolls of different, prominent black Americans. The event included a living tour and performance by the University gospel choir.

BY KRISTI JOHNSTON
Senior Writer

February is National Black History Month. The University honored the history and culture of black Americans both at the University and around the world by hosting its annual Black History Alive event.

Many attended the event, which was held at 7th Street House, including students, faculty, staff and community members. The event included a living tour and a performance by the University gospel choir.

The tour included a look at the movie "Amistad," which tells the story of a revolt aboard a slave ship. The next stop featured Associate Professor of History Leslie Patrick portraying Harriet Tubman, leading the way north to freedom on the Underground Railroad. Associate Professor of History Richard Waller and Jessica Morris '03 also partook in the event.

Participants then presented the stories of several black historical figures, such as Crispus Atticks, Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity founder Elder Watson Diggs, Ida B. Wells and Bill Cosby. The group also presented the histories of several black University alumni.

"We have history here at [the University]," said Garry Thaniel '03, resident assistant of 7th Street house. "Even though we go here, we don't know a lot about it."

Thaniel also said that Martin Luther King Jr.'s biography was presented on the alumni floor because the legend spoke at the University in 1958, a fact that many students did not know.

Following the tour, visitors had the opportunity to eat and listen to the gospel choir under the direction of Tim Johnson '04.

Organizers of the event were happy with this year's attendance.

"This year's turnout was really good. Every time I looked up there was another last tour," Kellen Smith '03 said. "I was really glad to see all types of people from professors to administration to custodians to students to Lewisburg people there."

Smith was also impressed with the enthusiasm of the crowds.

"Everyone was really impressed with the information about the black Bucknellians, which is something that is different from previous years," she said.

"I was happy [with the turnout] because it was such a tiring process," Thaniel said. "It was great to see the support of the Greek community, as well as other students and administrators."

Thaniel stressed that Black History Alive was the culmination of a group effort. "We have such a diverse group of residents [at 7th Street house]," he said. "We came together, regardless of race. I was really proud of everyone."

Black History Alive is part of the month-long celebration of black history, sponsored by Brothers and Sisters Empowered, the gospel choir, Kappa Alpha Psi, the Office of Multicultural Affairs and various professors.

BSG proposes ideas for swipe card uses

Digital cable television in dorms and professor feedback are also in the works

BY JENNIFER JENCHURA
Senior Writer

Digital cable, new uses for student identification cards and student feedback on professors top the agenda of the Bucknell Student Government (BSG). Working with the University to increase the amount of new technology available for student conveniences such as laundry swipe cards and digital cable are the focus of the new BSG administration this year.

Digital cable: entering the 21st century

"Academically related, in all the classrooms there are projectors and computers with PowerPoint. We want some of this new technology for students' everyday usage, too," BSG President Katy Timer '04 said.

Students have been fighting for cable TV for a long time. Although cable has been an issue on campus for the past four years, it is now more feasible than it has been.

This semester, BSG is investigating what price students would be willing to pay for cable. Each dorm's television ratio is different, which makes it more difficult to determine a general student consensus on the issue.

"I know the cable issue seems like it has been going on forever, but we are getting closer," Timer said.

Timer said that with the tightening of budgets around the University, "These technology issues are a longshot and not within the next couple of months."

Over the years, the idea of cable has moved from a moral issue to a cost issue.

"The decision not to have cable used to be a purely pedagogical issue, wanting students to focus on academics. However, cable now offers so much, including many educational options. It also allows students to be in touch with the world outside. Post-9/11 students have expressed they feel disconnected from the world," Associate Dean of Students and BSG Advisor Kari Conrad said.

Creamer's success helps team and program grow saying, 'Are you always in here?' She replied, 'Yeah, most of the time,' before continuing to take jump shots. I thought at that time that she was going to be something special because of all the time and effort she put into it."

Birdsong was right and the Orange and Blue program has grown from a good program to championship-caliber. All of Creamer's hard work paid off last season when the squad won the Patriot League title and a berth to the NCAA Tournament for the first time in the program's history.

"If I was asked to pick an achievement to be remembered by, it was being a part of the first team who won the Patriot League Championship for our program," Creamer said. "And to have been here when the program was really building. I was part of a true team because we achieved success and escaped adversity by playing hard and playing together, which is what [basketball] is all about."

In fact, Creamer still carries an amazing work ethic and love for the game that serve as inspiration to her teammates.

"She is a great leader in so many ways. Molly is so motivational and has so much desire to win and become the best that she can be," center Kristin Valdner '04 said. "She is in the gym on days off, before practice, after practice, to work on every aspect of her game. She has improved her game each day of each year I have been with her. Mols is such an inspiring person with a great heart, a great mind, a great work ethic and a great skill of playing the game of basketball."

Her outstanding work ethic has become infectious over the years. This year is no exception, as Creamer has mentored many of the young Bison in practice.

"I would probably attribute my growth as a player to both the veteran players and the coaches," starter Lindsey Geosits '06 said. "The level that I go against in practice every day is so much better than anything I have ever experienced. Going against Creamer and [senior Kate] Franks in practice makes going out against other players in the league so much easier."

> "When I look back at basketball, it will ever be about certain accomplishments. It will be about the adversity you overcome with your team, the teammates you played with and the lifelong friends you have made the memories with."
> —Molly Creamer '03

Teammate Gabrielle Miskinis '06 echoes the sentiment.

"Molly is a pillar of strength for everyone on the team," Miskinis said. "She is always upbeat and positive and has a kind word for anyone she talks to. She will do anything you ask of her in a heartbeat, without any thought about herself."

When Creamer is helping her teammates or sharing a memory with them is when she is at her happiest, and there is no teammate that Creamer is closer to than co-captain Franks. The two have built the program together, playing beside each other in 108 straight contests. Out on the court, it appears that they are reading each other's minds, and that feeling is no coincidence to Franks.

"On and off the court (Molly) has your back at all times," Franks said. "She is an amazing leader and anyone can learn from her by just looking at how she gets after herself."

Creamer is equally thankful for Franks' presence on the court.

"Franks epitomizes a team player and the heart of a champion," Molly said. "She has meant so much to the program, but I am so grateful to have her with me for the past four years."

Molly Creamer is someone that the Bucknell Community can look up to as a true sports idol. Though her outstanding achievements may seem untouchable, she has touched the lives of everyone around her in a way that will far outlive her records.

"When I look back at basketball, it will never be about certain 'accomplishments,'" Creamer said. "It will be about the adversity you overcome with your team, the teammates you played with and the lifelong friends you have made the memories with."

Catch Creamer and the Bucknell women's basketball team (9-12, 4-5 in the Patriot League) in action Sunday as they return to Sojka Pavilion to battle league rival Navy. Tipoff is scheduled for 2 p.m., and the game will be broadcast on ESPN 2.

Bucknell Brigade travels to Nicaragua

By Jason Oster
Staff Writer

The Bucknell Brigade was founded by students on this campus five years ago after Hurricane Mitch devastated the capital city of Managua, Nicaragua. Since then, the Bucknell Brigade has sent two delegations per year to Managua to help the people resettle the village of Nueva Vida. Nueva Vida is a settlement community for people whose homes were flooded around Lake Managua after the hurricane. In the past five years, University students have joined with other people from around the world to ease the resettlement of the 15,000 people currently living in the community of Nueva Vida.

Jubilee House is the agency that hosts University students on each trip to Nicaragua. This is where the students stay and eat while working in Nueva Vida.

Among the jobs the Brigade performed while in Nueva Vida was constructing a new roof for the newly-built living quarters of volunteers that come to stay at the Jubilee House. For two and a half days, the students along with Assistant Professor of Civil Engineering Mike Toole, worked in 98 degree weather.

This was not the only project that the University students took on. Some worked in a pharmacy, and others worked at a clinic helping Director of Student Health Services Dr. Donald Stechschulte. Most of the students who worked at the clinic were already fluent in Spanish. Those students helped to translate and took the height and weight of the Nicaraguans who sought health care at the expanding clinic.

The students explored Managua and other areas of this Central American country. Traveling around on an old school bus, they had the opportunity to visit local markets, monuments to others who have volunteered their time and energy in Nicaragua and old cathedrals. Some members of the Brigade had the pleasure of climbing an extinct volcano outside of Managua.

The students visited a coffee plantation in the mountains. The plantation, named El Porvenir, does not produce enough coffee beans to sell to large corporations such as Starbucks. Instead, they must sell to smaller, privately owned businesses for less money. The Bucknell Brigade brought back bags with them, and the coffee is just one of the items the Brigade is selling as a fundraiser available at the Samek Art Gallery. The coffee was purchased directly from the worker-owned Manual Jose Lopez co-operative in El Porvenir, Nicaragua, and it was roasted at La Prima Roasting Company in Pittsburgh, Pa. It sells for $10 a pound. The proceeds go to a small worker-owned co-operative in the Northwestern Mountains of Nicaragua to help the 15 farmers of the co-operative help feed their families.

The Brigade is not only trying to raise funds, but they wish to obtain certain over-the-counter products and prescription medicines to take back with them to Nicaragua, including prenatal vitamins, cough drops, aspirin, toothbrushes, toothpaste, bandages and splints. Some prescription medicines that would be well-received by the Brigade are antibiotics, decongestants, eye drops and rehydration medicines. These are just some of the items on the Bucknell Brigade's Wish List. For the full list contact Director of Service Learning Janice Butler. All donations may be taken to the Student Health Center.

Butler accompanied the students to the University and will try to sell items they brought back from Nicaragua to help the Brigade on future voyages to Central America.

"It was a pleasure working with the January student crew and I recommend this trip to all students who wish to travel and who want to learn about other cultures," Butler said.

Christian Decker '04 enjoyed making a difference as a member of the Brigade.

"Actually doing the work and a feeling of accomplishment [was the best part of the Brigade]. Knowing I helped people and somehow made a difference in the world," Decker said. "I also learned what I was capable of and how well I have it and the things that we as Americans take for granted. I saw how most of the world and Third World countries live."

Decker said the trip was a culture shock, but he would do it again.

"The Brigade is a great program and one of the better opportunities Bucknell offers simply because it is such a worthy cause," Decker said.

Jeremy Snyder '05 also went on the January trip to Nicaragua. He is an intern who works on the Brigade Web site, which is www.orgs.bucknell.edu/brigade. Snyder said that by going to Nicaragua he learned that Americans are pretty sheltered when it comes to understanding the living situations of developing nations.

"Not only [did I enjoy] leaving what we know as the 'Bucknell bubble,' but also leaving the American bubble. It is amazing just how different the rest of the world lives," Snyder said. "It gave me hope in America that there are some people who want to defy our stereotypes as being indifferent to other countries' poverty and misfortune."

Snyder advises other students going on the Brigade to remember the experience.

"Take film and lots of it because you're going to see some amazing things. And definitely people and things that you would never see at Bucknell," Snyder said.

The Brigade is a great experience, and the students learned and had fun while working to make some people's lives better. The next trip that the Brigade plans to make is over spring break, from March 8-16. For those students who want to have a great time, help some amazing people and learn about a culture completely different from their own, the Brigade could be a great opportunity.

Korea in breach of nuclear agreements

VIENNA, Austria—The International Atomic Energy Agency on Wednesday reported North Korea to the U.N. Security Council for violating international obligations on nuclear weapons. In an emergency closed door meeting in Vienna, the nuclear watchdog's 35-nation board of governors deemed North Korea in "noncompliance" after months of discussions with Pyongyang. Since October the regime has become increasingly brazen about its nuclear ambitions, and has kicked out U.N. monitors.

Pentagon calls up 38,000 reservists

WASHINGTON—The number of reservists and National Guardsmen mobilized for active duty has increased by 38,649 since last week, the Pentagon said Wednesday. The total on active duty now stands at just over 150,000 men and women called to serve as the United States continues its buildup for a possible war against Iraq.

Poll: United States concerned about smallpox

A Florida woman suffered what is believed to be the first averse reaction to the smallpox vaccine since the voluntary program started nationwide last month. Despite its many risks, the majority of Americans are concerned about the possibility of a smallpox attack and would choose to get the inoculation, an Associated Press poll indicated.

Ebola outbreak suspected in Congo

SAE donates money to local charity

By Jeff Day
Staff Writer

The brotherhood of Sigma Alpha Epsilon (SAE) recently presented a check of over $6,000 to the Donald Heiter Community Center. Money was raised through the sale of $20 raffle tickets, representing the possibility of prizes including a diamond bracelet, flat screen television and $1,000 cash.

The Donald Heiter Community Center, located on North 5th Street in Lewisburg, is similar to a Boys and Girls Club that helps keep the local children active in a safe and enjoyable environment.

Philanthropy Chair Emory Strother '04 said that this year's response to duty was tremendous.

"For us, it was far more a matter of doing what we could, of genuinely committing our time and efforts to a cause without reservation, and without a finishing line, and I think that goal was met," Strother said.

Last year, SAE released slightly over $4,000 in raffle ticket sales, and used this amount as a benchmark for this year's efforts. Because of the hard work of many enthusiastic brothers, who took a strong initiative in this year's project, the brotherhood was able to surpass all previous charitable donations.

"The house's togetherness in supporting this event has given us confidence in our ability to make a difference and have an impact on other important causes we hope to support in the upcoming year," Strother said.

The raffle itself was the conclusion of the Chocolate Festival, an annual community event in which contestants enter chocolate deserts for judging. SAE became involved with the Chocolate Festival last year and wished to maintain their relationship with the event.

"Every year this is our favorite and most successful community service and philanthropy event, and we look forward to helping out next year," Charles Markey '04 said.

The Chocolate Festival was held on Feb. 1, and nearly all the members of SAE participated. The brotherhood contributed over 300 hundred hours of service to help run the event and partake in the cleanup effort.

Markey said SAE is currently organizing an all day Easter egg hunt for children of Lewisburg that will take place at the fraternity house. They also have plans to host a nonalcoholic dance party from which all proceeds will aid the University's Students Against Multiple Sclerosis group.

Other SAE events and news are described on its Web page: http://www.orgs.bucknell.edu/sae, according to which donations will benefit the Donald Heiter Community Center.

Housing

will not be as much of a housing crunch as last year. As a result, Bucknell West will no longer have five students per Mod.

"That was only a temporary measure," Dean of Students Richard Ferraro said. "Next year we will go back to four students in a Mod."

By next year, renovations on Vedder Hall will be complete. One wing of the hall is currently being renovated, and the other half will be finished over the summer.

"Vedder has several problems which need to be corrected. It has problems with moisture, pipes and leakage. We are also going to remove asbestos and improve air conditioning," Ferraro said.

The University is now in a cycle of doing some major dormitory renovations every year.

"Prior to this past year, that cycle had been interrupted, and we had gone several years without a major renovation," Vice President of Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 said. "Harris was renovated in the summer of '98, two wings of Swartz had been done in the summer of '99, but then we missed '00-'01. Now we're back into it."

Doing renovations in cycles helps save money.

"We try to put our buildings on a rotation so we keep up the quality. Certain schools that have not done that; and they get a very big check later on when all the buildings come due for renovations," Ferraro said.

Though many large dormitories are seeing renovations, smaller houses will not be neglected.

"Early drafts of Vision 2010 call for an accelerated timeline of renovations, not only to the major halls, but also to the small housing units like 7th Street House, Carey House and Edwards House, and maintenance of a tighter cycle once we get through this one," Pollock said.

Even though Vision 2010 calls for an accelerated timeline, funding still remains a question.

"These renovations, academic ideas and other physical plans all have to be integrated and prioritized and then held up against the resources available," Pollock said.

Giant proposal raises safety, environmental concerns

GIANT

ed in the traffic study," Rural Route Neighbors leader Erica Shames said. "It's also our contention that the firm reviewing the traffic study, Gannett Fleming, may have a conflict of interest as they've done quite a bit of work for Giant in the past."

The Rural Route Neighbors contend that the increase in traffic volume, particularly on the back roads, will make recreational activities once enjoyed by residents living near these roads hazardous.

"The increased traffic resulting from large-scale development of this site on these rural routes will jeopardize the safety of our kids and the people—including the many Bucknell students—who utilize those roads for recreational purposes—from jogging and walking to bicycling," Shames said.

In its initial sketch plan, RVG Management and Development Company included plans for a traffic light to aid in traffic control, a proposal that must be processed through the Pennsylvania Department of Transportation, not the township.

"Putting a light on Route 15 on or at the bottom of a slope that steep is suicide," Erica Shames said. "No matter what the season—but particularly in winter—coming to a stop there is virtually impossible," especially considering the many tractor-trailer rigs that utilize that road.

Illuminating the store is another concern of residents, especially those living in Fox Hollow, a development only 250 feet from the site.

Water runoff due to the proposed location at the peak of a hill, is also a concern of the Rural Route Neighbors. Residents are worried that the ground will not be able to support the increased water runoff from the hill based on the amount of land that will be covered with asphalt.

"The environmental impact of placing a store of this size on that property are so vast that the local chapter of the Sierra Club and Organizations United for the Environment—the group responsible for thwarting the building of a hazardous waste incinerator in nearby Allenwood—have come out in favor of RRN's position against this development," Shames said.

Observatory use threatened

According to Vice President of Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70, the University has taken no official position on the development of the Giant supermarket and fueling station, but is conscious of the many voices of opposition, both in town and on campus.

Of concern to the University, and particularly the physics department, is the impact of the proposed Giant on the observatory, which potentially would be affected by light pollution on its southwest side. Nighttime use of the observatory would be primarily disturbed if the store was open 24 hours.

According to Associate Professor of Physics Ned Ladd, the physics department wrote a letter to the East Buffalo Township supervisors expressing concern about the limitations they may result from the store last fall recommending that the builder install "responsible lighting," which would alleviate any potential problems.

Responsible lighting involves both reducing the total amount of light generated and eliminating any excess light in areas that do not need to be lit, according to Ladd.

"Both of these issues can be addressed with properly shielded or 'hooded' lighting," Ladd said. "This type of light fixture directs the light in a fairly controlled beam to the areas that should be lit."

Utilizing responsible lighting, although marginally more expensive to install, would lower energy costs because the lighting is more focused and would require in a lower wattage bulbs.

Giant Public Relations Representative Denny Hopkins, confirmed that the store, like most Giant supermarkets, will be open 24 hours, but, according to Hopkins, the Giant corporate office has been aware of the light pollution concern since the beginning stages of development, and has successfully dealt with similar lighting challenges in the past.

"Giant is considering lighting that will not conflict with the observatory," Hopkins said. "We have had experience in directing light away from unwanted areas in other situations."

According to Ladd, if Giant does not cooperate with requests for responsible lighting, the light pollution will be difficult to diminish.

"We have some filters which help to block out light pollution without also blocking too much of the light from celestial sources, but we can never fully mitigate the effects of an artificially brightened night sky," Ladd said.

A complicated past

The Rural Route Neighbors was formed almost immediately after the community first learned that there was a sketch plan submitted to East Buffalo Township.

Violet Gallagher, a Rural Route Neighbor steering committee member told The Bucknellian last fall that RVG Management and Development Company submitted this initial sketch plan to the East Buffalo Township zoning officer as a Conditional Use Plan, a requirement when more than one building is proposed. Under normal circumstances, the zoning officer would review the plan and submit it to the township planning commission. The planning commission would then makes a recommendation to the township supervisor and a hearing is held.

The planning commission recommended that the township supervisor accept the plan, but the plan was withdrawn before a public hearing could be held because this plan was withdrawn once townspeople were informed of the plan and began protesting.

At this point, the nature of the development was unspecified, although townspeople suspected that it would be a Giant supermarket based on information from the Web site of the developer and a sign depicting the Giant logo on the development plan.

According to The Daily Item, the proposed building site was partially zoned as residential property until two years ago when the landowners, the Jon Lewis family, petitioned East Buffalo Township to zone some of the property for highway commercial development.

The Rural Route Neighbors contend that the zoning transfer was illegal, and are currently appealing township, further delaying Giant's preliminary plans.

"It [the appeal] is based on evidence we've uncovered that shows that improper procedures were followed when the property was rezoned. There is a stay on the property—no development can proceed—at least until a final decision is made," Shames said.

Both the zoning board meeting, in which the township will announce the outcome of the zoning appeal by Rural Route Neighbors and the planning commission meeting, during which the announcement will be made if Township land ordinances have been met will be held at 6:30 p.m. on Feb. 26 at Eichorn Middle School.

A questionable future

Despite the recent plan submissions by Giant, the Rural Route Neighbors said that they will continue to challenge the development.

"Rural Route Neighbors plan to keep Giant tied up in legal proceedings for a long time to prevent them from building a store on a site that is obviously inappropriate for safety, environmental and quality-of-life reasons," Shames said.

According to Hopkins, Giant has listened to all of the concerns of the Rural Route Neighbors and is trying to reach agreements that will please both parties.

"We are trying to reach a win-win situation on both sides," Hopkins said. "Our goal is to be a good community neighbor."

According to Shames, the Rural Route Neighbors are not opposed to construction on the Lewis property, provided that the development would not threaten the residential or environmental safety of the area.

"We would like to see the front portion [of the Lewis property] house a one- or two-story office building, professional building or some other commercial establishment that would not have the negative environmental, safety and quality-of-life impact development of this magnitude would have on this community," Shames said.

Rural Route Neighbors also invite Giant into their community, but feel that a location further north or south on Route 15 or further west on Route 45 would be more practical.

"Bottom line: We welcome Giant to Lewisburg on any other site but this one," Shames said.

BSG looks to make campus improvements

BSG

Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

BSG is looking to make many improvements on campus such as using swipe cards for laundry. Other ideas for advances include digital cable in dorm rooms, professor feedback and the addition of a permanent uphill eatery.

makes it more difficult to determine a general student consensus on the issue.

"In new McDonnell Hall there is one TV for 19 students, but in Vedder there is one TV for the whole building of 367 residents. To determine students' interest in cable is crucial. Students should have confidence in their student representatives and share their opinions," Assistant Dean of Students, Director of Housing and Residential Life Dan Remley said.

It has been established that cable has its academic merits, but students cannot get local channels or basic reception in their dorm.

"It is the belief of the student representation that cable television is an imminent need—with professors asking students to watch documentaries, MSNBC, CNN, History Channel and various other educational programs, in addition to climactic moments in our country's history such as presidential elections, the events of Sept. 11, the Olympic Games, the constant coverage on the war against terrorism and others, one TV for 400 students—such as the situation in Swartz Hall—is clearly insufficient," said Laura Day, '03 Senior Class president and former fiscal committee BSG Chair.

Day began the fight for cable as a first-year student and brought the committee's ideas to the president for his support. This year BSG will tell the trustees about students' desires for cable.

"The initiative to get cable television in all dorm rooms on campus began four years ago with the Fiscal Sub-Committee of BSG," Day said. "The Fiscal Committee produced an extensive document that included an enumeration of our reference schools that had cable, possible funding sources, contending cable packages and technology sources, lists of advantageous reasons to have cable on campus, etc. The committee then took its proposal to Vice President Pollock, Dean Remley of OHRL and representatives of Physical Plant. This process took the first year plus."

With the support of the president's staff, BSG representatives and key players on campus created the Task Force for Cable Television on Campus. They spent the last year and a half researching different technologies to bring cable television to all dorms and have recently decided on the best option. The goal of the task force is to present to the Board of Trustees in April a feasible, affordable and persuasive proposal for cable television.

Although with support from both students and from the Bucknell Parents' Board, the task force still recognizes the upcoming challenges of their struggle.

In a BSG survey, 94 percent of all students advocated for cable TV. This grassroots support has been instrumental in the process for getting cable TV on campus," Day said. "Although the Parents Board and the student body endorse cable TV, the Board of Trustees must ultimately find cable's appropriate—both educational and co-curricular—role in its Vision 2010 plan."

Cable access may be a standard feature of every dorm room within the next two years.

"Pending approval of both the moral and philosophical idea of cable TV and the fiscal implications of such an endeavor, the task force hopes to have a pilot program this upcoming school year in select dorms," Day said. "Upon successful completion of the test program, cable will be installed in all dorms for the 2004-05 school year."

Due to the increasing obsolescence of analog cable, the University will not be installing wires for the same type of cable currently available in the Mods and Gateways. A new cable package would offer digital cable through an Internet connection that could be accessed all over campus, including wireless laptops.

Costs for cable television include the content packages, pertinent individual equipment and possibly initial head-end equipment. The task force anticipates a modest increase in everyone's room fee to cover the costs, as cable access will not be optional. The price of cable would be slightly more than the average per person cost of the cable package offered in the Mods and Gateways and may also include more channels.

According to Remley, adding cable access to individual dorm rooms will not hurt the current cable access found in student lounges.

"The lounge TVs will still be supported, but in the future you may be able to type on your computer while watching TV on your computer while also watching a regular TV," Remley said.

Do you take BUID?

The University will be redoing student identification cards in the summer of 2004 in an effort to increase security.

The administration wants to stop using the current system so students are not recognized by their social security number. In the long run this is for their protection. It is unclear as to the exact makeup of the new card, though instead of a magnetic strip it may contain a chip that will increase its versatility.

With the approval of the new card, BSG is working quickly to coincide the new changes in the swipe cards with student desires to use their cards in other venues. Possible options for the new card include laundry, food and copying vending.

> "The lounge TVs will still be supported, but in the future you may be able to type on your computer while watching TV on your computer while also watching a regular TV."
> —Dan Remley, director of housing and residential life

"We feel swipe cards are an important issue for students and BSG is developing a plan for swipe cards," Timer said.

Although approved in the fall, BSG realized the definitive card changes just two weeks ago when Timer invited Director of Technology Integration Brian Hoyt and Remley, both members of the University's Administration Computing Committee, to speak to BSG Congress on the technology issues involved in the cards and cable. They also discussed congress' support and student backing for the changes.

"Students need to decide what they want the card to do. My role is to help determine student interest and establish communication and provide feedback among various university constituents, including students," Remley said. "One idea or goal is to have a one-card system so that students won't have to carry around several cards for different uses. The services will all be contained onto one card."

In the future students may not have to buy an additional card to copy materials at the library.

Swipe cards are also a more permanent solution to the quarter crisis on campus. There are no change machines on campus.

"Change machines aren't going to happen. Swipe cards are a more long-term solution because then we don't have to use quarters at all," Timer said.

BSG representative Emily Rentschler '03 is the head of a committee that will work on swipe card technology and look into student interest.

"I attended University of Richmond my freshman year and they had a one-card system. The card was used as a meal card, a traditional declining balance card for dining services as we use it, but it was also used to pay for laundry, vending machines and food from local businesses. This was all done on a debit card type system. There was also the capability to use it at the bookstore and restaurant on campus like a debit card. The cards were also used as the key to get into the dorms (not individual rooms) on campus, as well as enter the gym," Rentschler said.

The committee will look at other issues such as a list of possible vendors and specifically how the fees will be charged.

"Emily's committee will investigate to see if students think the card should have separate declining balances at each venue or if laundry should be billed as to students' addresses like dorm damages," Timer said.

Finding the perfect match: Professor feedback

A more informative choice when it comes to choosing professors. BSG's goal of the recent student survey is to create a system that would enable student comments to be read before choosing a professor.

"The goal of the survey is to generate some feedback concerning what type of questions should be asked to students describing how a professor teaches. The goal is not to produce a ranking system, but rather a system that is more informative than the descriptions that are currently available on courses," Timer said

This way students can learn more about the different styles of professors—lecture based, discussion oriented, favorite thing from taking the class, multiple choice versus essay tests, etc.—so that students may gauge which professor's teaching style would be most suitable for a student.

Waiting for results

Conrad warns students not to be disgruntled about the slow speed of approval for BSG's goals.

"Although change is a slow-moving process, the great thing about the cable issue with BSG is its continuity. Oftentimes issues are dropped because of changes in the student administration and each administration prioritizes differently. On the issue of cable, BSG has been a consistent voice for students. The commitment [of BSG executives] to the student body is second to none," Conrad said.

Conrad points to the Bison Express as an example of how the process can work.

"An uphill eatery was talked about one year ago before the trailer got there," Conrad said.

Currently plans are to expand the Bison Express. After purchasing a new, bigger trailer for the Bison Express due to expensive utilities and aesthetic reasons, the University decided against docking it next to the library and plans to establish an eatery for the quad in the library.

Memo: assassinating students' ideas

MEMO
To: Senior Administrators
From: Executioner of Student Initiatives
Subject: Our New "Five-Year Plan"

As we begin planning for the next fiscal year, I have taken the liberty of updating our Five-Year Plan. For those new members of our ever-changing administration, I will include some background facts about this plan. In the Five-Year Plan we dispose of all the good ideas our tuition-paying subjects propose to improve the quality of life on campus. The premise of this plan is deceptively simple: Since the common student only spends four years on campus, any improvement that the students want but we don't feel the need to pursue can be relegated to the Five-Year Plan. This way, we can forget about the initiative until the student graduates and we can then repeat this process with the next generation of enterprising student leaders.

The current Five-Year Plan contains four very good ideas whose implementation must be denied. It is therefore imperative that the administration continue to suppress the Bucknell Student Government (BSG). BSG is only powerful when it demands a seat at the proverbial decision-making table, and the Five-Year Plan continues to limit the amount of representation. Until students refuse to be excluded from this decision-making, we will be free to pursue any policy we desire.

Issues currently under the plan include the uphill eatery and cable TV. (In a bit of irony, we named the uphill eatery the "Bison Express" not because the food was prepared quickly, but because we cancelled the program so quickly after initiating it—here it is, there it goes). The eatery is now being "studied for further improvements" and cable TV is being "studied for feasibility." I for one find it amusing that we do more studying of student projects than the students do for their classes. Luckily for us, many of the most active and convincing proponents of cable TV are seniors this year, so we only have to stall for another four months until they graduate.

Our most recent addition to the plan is allowing students to use meal credits in the Bison on weekends. This concept has existed since before I came to the University. To forestall the growing momentum for its permanent implementation, we decided to try the idea out on a "trial basis." As many of you may know, the trial basis is a great way to delay saying no to an idea. Once the trial basis is over, we will need to spend semesters studying what happened during the trial basis, how to fix the associated problems and how we would go about implementing a new policy. By then so many variables will have changed that the conclusions drawn from this trial basis will no longer be valid, and we can begin the process all over again with a new trial sometime around 2008.

Finally, there is a new issue that is demanding of our attention. The concept of expanding declining balance accounts to be able to pay for laundry and food in town is in danger of being implemented soon. While we are usually able to stall new ideas for at least one year before pretending to be considering them for a second year, this initiative was too well organized to allow us that option.

Members of BSG sought out local businesses in town and worked out other logistics before they came and formally proposed the idea to us. The concept makes too much sense to dismiss directly, the logistics appear to work and the idea has overwhelming student support; in short, this is the most outrageous idea to come to our attention in quite a while.

I am bereft of ideas to stop or even slow down this proposal and would appreciate any help you can give in obstructing this competitive threat to our monopoly at the Bison and Caf.

On many of these points, I have been disturbed to hear of certain members of the administration who favor implementing these ideas and some who are even working with students. I urge those "student-sympathizers" to cease aiding the enemy.

President George W. Bush should learn from Irish conflict

An open letter to U.S. President George W. Bush

Dear Mr. President:

Although I understand that you are very busy these days, I encourage you to watch a recent feature film "Bloody Sunday" for the lessons that this event, a watershed in the sectarian conflict in Northern Ireland, may teach regarding your planned military action in Iraq.

Prior to Bloody Sunday (Jan. 30, 1972), in which 13 unarmed Catholic civilian civil-rights marchers were killed by British paratroopers (sent, ostensibly, to keep the peace) in Derry, Northern Ireland, the Irish Republican Army (IRA) numbered fewer than 100 active members. Within weeks of these killings, the ranks of the IRA swelled well beyond all previous proportions.

It is fair to say that the military action by the British on Bloody Sunday created or, at the very least, revived the modern IRA. This horrendous blunder on the part of the British government had the direct result of ENCOURAGING and PROMOTING terrorism. As a result, more than 3,000 people have died in the last 30 years in a tiny country of 2 million.

Making war against Iraq is likely to produce the same result, albeit on a global scale, with the result that we will be LESS secure than ever before. I urge you to reconsider the course of action you have planned or, at the very least, to think through more carefully its likely consequences.

You will not root out terrorism by attacking Iraq. Rather, you will create considerably more enmity toward our country than currently exists, thereby INCREASING the very motivation that produces terrorism in the first place.

Frankly, I am surprised that Prime Minister Blair has not learned this lesson, since the United Kingdom is still suffering from the consequences of ill-informed military actions taken on its own people more than 30 years later. Perhaps you might ask him about this the next time the two of you discuss our respective international policies.

Making war against Iraq is likely to produce the same result, albeit on a global scale, with the result that we will be LESS secure than ever before. I urge you to reconsider the course of action you have planned or, at the very least, to think through more carefully its likely consequences.

Sincerely,
William F. Flack Jr., Ph.D.

Co-Director, Bucknell in Northern Ireland

The Savilla experience

To the Editor:

I recently received your letter introducing The Bucknellian. Ironically the same day Dick Nelson, a friend, gave me a copy of the Jan. 24 issue containing the article on Sevilla, Spain by Meghann Peace. The reason he did this is because my son, Neal, is currently spending his Spring Semester in Sevilla. Neal is a junior at The University of Pittsburgh, majoring in Spanish.

I thought the article was very well written and gave me a good appreciation for why Neal is so enthusiastic about the experience. Please pass on my appreciation to Meghann for the excellent job she did on that article. My wife, Sue, and I are in the process of planning a trip to visit Neal at the end of his semester in May. If Meghann has any suggestions on how to enhance that experience, we would like to hear from her.

Thank you for your efforts to improve communications with the community.

Sincerely,
Keith Smalley

Susan B Anthony was a champion for all Americans

To the Editor:

I would like to wish Susan B. Anthony a happy birthday on Feb. 15. That day commemorates the 183rd anniversary of her birth.

Most people recognize the name "Susan B. Anthony" as that of the great women's rights campaigner. She was indeed instrumental in helping women achieve the right to vote in 1920.

Anthony was opposed to slavery and legal prostitution. She believed everyone should have the right to vote. Anthony believed that all people should be treated equally and she made no exception for the unborn; she was opposed to abortion. It is often unreported in history that Anthony held such strong pro-life views.

That is why I'm writing to you today in honor of her birthday. I want everyone to know that Anthony was not just a champion for women, but also a champion for the unborn.

Sincerely,
Ann K. Rosko '05

Health Center performs admirably in parent's eyes

To the Editor:

On behalf of Nicholas Mauritz '06, I want to thank the staff at the University Health Center for all the kindness and professionalism you showed to my son this past semester. In addition, I would like to thank the staff for all their assistance, information and encouragement that was offered to Nick's dad and me during this trying period.

Being 7.5 hours from home, the staff was able to answer our questions and calm our anxiety. Although, you were all very busy, you welcomed our calls as if nothing in the world was more important than Nick. I will be forever grateful for your kindness. Had Nick not been properly diagnosed by the Health Center, I can not even imagine what the result may have been.

The Health Center is crucial to the students at Bucknell University and I hope that the center continues to receive the praise and recognition from the University, that is so rightfully deserves. As a parent, I am confident that Nick is being well taken care of. I look forward to thanking the staff in person, once I return to Bucknell.

Sincerely,
Jamie Mauritz James '81

Good Luck John inspires student's song

To the Editor:

I read about Good Luck John in a recent issue of The Bucknellian, and I felt compelled to write in. I'm sure he'd be heartened to know that there are a lot of people who are concerned about him, and wish him well. In fact, the article about his poor health has been traveling around the Bucknell University alumni e-mail circuit, and arrived in my inbox last weekend.

I actually wrote a song about John last year, inspired by John's optimism, sincerity and resolve. I thought it might cheer him up to hear it (bad singing usually cheers people up).

Do you think someone on The Bucknellian staff would deliver it to him?

Sincerely,
Pete Latshaw '95

Editor's note: Special thanks to Mail Services Supervisor Art Moser for visiting John in the hospital and delivering Latshaw's song. John is now at the Kramm Nursing Home in Room 55 on Mahoning Street in Milton, Pa. 17847. He will be there for a period of time until a room is available at Riverwood's Nursing Home in Lewisburg in order to be closer to Lewisburg's churches, which is what he wants. John has been very talkative and loves visits, and he has much to share. Latshaw's song about John is available to the public online at http://www.orgs.bucknell.edu/bucknellian/john.htm.*

For so many years I have been under the impression that the soul of diversity shines with the distinct characteristics and qualities of people and the benefits thereof. Perhaps it was wishful thinking, optimism or denial that led me to believe such things. Now, with each passing day, I am reminded that our "diversity" is not a celebration of differences, but a surreptitiously created state of exclusivity. The practice of "diversification" is an exercise in racial discrimination whereby race and genealogy are paramount and take priority over merit.

If you are "American Indian," "Asian or Pacific Islander," "African-American" or "Hispanic," you are a "minority." No matter how intelligent, talented, charismatic, athletic or cultured you are, many people in the University community will not look beyond the pseudo-merit of your race to see your true value as a person. If you are "white" or "non-minority," you will be assessed equally as much by your race, only that assessment will suggest that you are of lesser value because your skin color is not as unique in a society of people whose skin colors are mostly pinkish. So when the University community celebrates diversity, rest assured that many are not interested in the unique talents and characteristics that make each one of us invaluable. Many concern themselves with race in an effort to vaunt their supposed concern over the disadvantages of being in a melanin minority.

This sort of thinking is built upon a foundation of assumptions that is nothing less than racist. As the multiculturalist theory goes, attracting and pandering to the race-related interests of selected minorities yields greater diversity. This is the case because people with black skin think alike, people of Asian heritage think alike, people of Hispanic decent think alike, Native Americans think alike and people with white skin, regardless of their heritage, all think alike.

A community is said to be more diverse if it has a greater mix of people with different skin colors and ethnicities. The fallacy of this school of thought is blatantly obvious: Race most certainly does not account for differences (or diversity) in human personality. Though cultural upbringing does, you cannot determine people's cultural upbringings by looking at the particular "ethnicity" box they checked on their college applications. Likewise, offering a special recruitment weekend for "minority" students will not guarantee a diverse group of individuals simply because they have different skin color. Alluding to a recent announcement about "minority" prelaw recruiting at Georgetown University, it is quite possible to have people of vastly different races show up, all of whom are interested in ... you guessed it ... going to law school. How diverse. To state it in simplest terms: You cannot learn anything about diversity or human personality by inquiring about skin color or suggesting that race is a major contributing factor to healthy, meaningful diversity.

When we seek a form of diversity that is rooted in racial labeling, we are only perpetuating the race problem .... We are assigning individuals—full of depth; full of value; full of life—to shallowly and narrowly defined racial identities that hardly ever fit.

Ethnic "minorities" are not the only people whose most important qualities are disregarded by the multiculturalist quest for diversity. Just as, for example, a "black" person from New York is pigeonholed into the same category as a distinctly different "black" person from London as a result of racial labeling, "white" people of different cultural backgrounds are now considered the same.

According to the ideology behind "diversity" quotas and "diversity" enhancement programs, "white" people cannot be diverse (unless they are homosexual or non-Christian). Though there exists in reality an extraordinary diversity of cultural, socioeconomic and ideological backgrounds within each and every race represented at the University, it is often suggested that "whites" simply cannot understand the concepts of diversity and minority status.

As Assistant Professor of English Tish Crawford is quoted in "The Demand for Diversity" in the January 2003 edition of Bucknell World, "Most white students are unable to see below the surface" (when "black" students react strongly or seemingly overreact to offensive behavior). Similarly, Kellen Smith '03 , quoted in the same article, said, "It's not that they're racist, but they're ignorant about minorities. When they talk to a black student, they make certain assumptions."

Please, please forgive me of my assumed ignorance. Ironically, Crawford and Smith's commentaries are exemplary of the exact kinds of assumptions that are made by the "diversity" camp at the University: Skin color alone determines what kinds of attitudes and assumptions are made about different people. While commenting on alleged assumptions made by "whites" about "blacks" or "minorities," Crawford and Smith have made very bold and equally racist assumptions about "non-minorities." They have assumed that "whites" or "non-minorities" are too ignorant or not perceptive enough to understand the plight of being in the minority.

"There is no such thing as "black" and "white" in the racial and racist context in which we throw such labels around. True diversity is about talents, interests, personality, experiences and ideas, none of which are contingent upon any particular race."

This is merely one of many public indications that a substantial portion of the University community's "diversity" camp truly feels that "whites" or "non-minorities" are a homogenous group that is incapable of understanding concepts of diversity and minority status. Is it possible that in the aggregate experiences of all "whites" throughout history, not one has ever experienced the feelings of frustration or alienation associated with being in the minority?

I was fortunate enough to stumble upon a highly offensive and surprisingly useful history text, "How the Irish Became White," by Noel Ignatiev of Harvard University. Ignatiev's text is essentially about how Irish emigrants to America were considered, in their former Ireland and during their early years in America, as destitute a group as were "blacks." Irish "whites," now considered to be "an oppressing race," were once very much an "oppressed" race.

Ignatiev's discussion was of particular interest to me because the oppressive/oppressed (who knows which?) Irish are my ancestors. How did I become an oppressor? Igantiev has a fantastic answer to this question: "People are members of different races because they have been assigned to them."

There is no such thing as "black" and "white" in the racial and racist context in which we throw such labels around. True diversity is about talents, interests, personality, experiences and ideas, none of which are contingent upon any particular race. When we seek a form of diversity that is rooted in racial labeling, we are only perpetuating the race problem that Ignatiev describes in his book: We are assigning individuals—full of depth; full of value; full of life—to shallowly and narrowly defined racial identities that hardly ever fit.

As I look around, I see a tremendous amount of people who are unhappy with their assignments, and the racial perceptions that they entail. I see a tremendous amount of talented, interesting and diverse people yearning to break free from racial molds and emerge as individuals.

Resurrecting manifest destiny

By Aaron DeRosa
Senior Editor

I think every analyst who is drawing the line between Bush Senior's Persian Gulf War and the impending war that Bush Junior is pushing on America like Strom Thurmond trying to hock tickets outside a Missy Elliott concert is being too nearsighted.

I'm not the first to draw this connection, mostly because I'm lazy, but I think it's important to point out nonetheless: In 1898, America went to war against Spain in the aptly titled "Spanish-American War." It wasn't because of a threat of an oil shortage, it wasn't because of a jihad and it certainly wasn't because of weapons of mass destruction. The two critical factors were the idea of "manifest destiny" and the practice of "yellow journalism."

Manifest destiny, for those unfamiliar, was a jingoist notion that held that it was America's "divine right" to expand its borders, namely applying to the annexation of Texas, California, Alaska and, in this particular instance, Cuba.

This type of sentiment, though not indoctrinated in us as explicitly as manifest destiny was into the oxen-tough psyches of 19th century Americans, is still as rich in America's blood as it was then, though the façade is more brownstone than Victorian these days.

Today, this neo-manifest destiny shrouds all American foreign policy, from our failure to back the Kyoto accords to our disintegrating alliance with NATO. America has ushered in a new imperialism, an imperialism cloaked in the patriotic rhetoric of "self-sufficiency," a veritable isolationist decree and the notion that America's will is the "right" will.

Should we be reliant on foreign oil? Maybe yes, maybe no. How about we slaughter a country to find out? America's neo-manifest destiny is engrained in us like the shrapnel in my leg I got in 'Nam. It is this philosophy that guides all of our talks with foreign nations, why we vilify Iraq, North Koreans and Muslims and, ultimately, why we are headed to war faster than Donny Rumsfield if he were given control of "the button."

America has always fought against tyranny, but here we are in 2003 and tyranny has undergone a makeover, spiriting a comeback the likes of which haven't been seen since bell-bottoms became flare-pants. This new tyranny is not the work of a single man, but a tyranny of the mob, an American mob, driven by fear, guided by the media and orchestrated by the Bush Administration.

Now to say that only G. W. is responsible for this would-be a fallacy. But Clinton's foreign transgressions were far less abrasive than our current president's actions. Clinton's bombings, diversionary tactics in Operation Mask My Libido, were less about establishing universal American supremacy, and more like the lovable kid next door getting Beaver into trouble, taking him on another one of his hairbrained schemes (though I speak sarcastically, this can be debated elsewhere).

Dubya, on the other hand, has been masterful in his handling of his job. His mandate, in question at inauguration, was guaranteed on Sept. 11 and he has used it as political leverage ever since. How has he been able to slip this by us? Because he is the best media-president this country has ever seen.

Clinton had charisma, but Bush's stuttering stupidity has become our main focus. We're so concerned about the next "strategery" that we can't focus on the ideas he's actually disseminating: fear.

That's what it all comes down to in the end. Whether intentionally or unintentionally, the conservative media bias (yes, conservative—the big business, pro-war sentiment seems fitting enough to categorize it thus) has whipped America into a furor.

The Department of Homeland Security, the political fear machine, in conjunction with the media, has raised xenophobia to an almost hallowed art form. Between high alerts, the need for plastic bags and duct tape in case of a chemical attack and the fact that Saddam Hussein gets more airtime than high school basketball phenom LeBron James, it's no wonder my heart rate quickens every time I turn on the news—watching 5 minutes of MSNBC is like 30 minutes on the treadmill.

Prior to the Spanish-American War, Joseph Pulitzer and William Randolph Hearst, newspaper magnates, sensationalized tensions with Spain in order to bring about the war. Dubbed "yellow journalism," Pulitzer and Hearst used emotional appeals to the public and sensationalized headlines to drum up national support.

It is remarkable how true the adage that those who forget the past are doomed to repeat it truly is. America finds itself today, striding forth into a new century, plagued by the same rhetoric and pomp that afflicted it at the turn of the 20th century.

How different is our media right now when the lead story is that Iraq is allied with al-Qaida? I fail to see how a media-released tape confirms or denies any sort of political stance on the part of Iraq. By that logic, does the Bush administration support Asian culinary competition because the Iron Chef got good ratings?

What it comes down to is this: "A new consciousness seems to have come upon us—the consciousness of strength—and with it a new appetite, the yearning to show our strength ... Ambition, interest, land hunger, pride, the mere joy of fighting, whatever it may be, we are animated by a new sensation. We are face to face with a strange destiny. The taste of Empire is in the mouth of the people even as the taste of blood in the jungle ...." This quote was taken from an editorial in The Washington Post in 1898, the day before the Spanish-American War.

Dubya's State of the Union Address earlier this month stated, "Our first priority must always be the security of our nation ... We will win this war; we'll protect our homeland ... [we must] do everything possible to protect our citizens and strengthen our nation against the ongoing threat of another attack ... We are protected from attack only by vigorous action abroad, and increased vigilance at home."

Colin Powell, addressing the U.N. Security Council, said, "We must not shrink from whatever is ahead of us. We must not fail in our duty and our responsibility for the citizens of the countries that are represented by this body."

Though the rhetoric changes, the sentiment remains. It is remarkable how true the adage that those who forget the past are doomed to repeat it truly is. America finds itself today, striding forth into a new century, plagued by the same rhetoric and pomp that afflicted it at the turn of the 20th century. One in three English citizens thinks we're a greater threat to world peace than Iraq. In America, I know at least there's one in 280 million.

Mission creep in Columbia threatens war on terror

Mike Niebauer
Senior Writer

With all the current attention focused on Iraq and the challenge of nuclear weapon proliferation from North Korea, many would say that the United States has a full plate. Not true, according to the latest budget from the Bush administration. The White House is seeking to increase its military assistance to the government of Colombia by $110 million this year. This assistance, reported by Marcela Sanchez of The Washington Post, is assistance without any constraints as to locale or any particular mission or military operation.

The Colombian military can use this 15 percent increase in funding at its own discretion. This was not our policy with Colombia for many years. In fact, administration after administration avoided getting overly involved in the Colombian civil war, which is largely funded by drug profits. The Bush administration seems to be embracing a military relationship with the Colombian military that has been traditionally seen as too risky.

This bold move is showing a tolerance toward the blurring of the original mission of Plan Colombia, which started under the Clinton administration. Plan Colombia was put in place to counter drug trafficking and to stop drugs at the Colombian source. Mission creep in this case is shown when funding and involvement increase as effectiveness and national resolve is publicly questioned.

The Bush White House answered this by mixing the war on terrorism with the drug war initiative in Colombia. Sanchez reported, "The Colombian government already receives the most U.S. security aid among countries in the region since the Cold War. Five months ago what had been unimaginable for years was written into law: U.S. aid intended to fight drugs could be used to fight insurgents."

The mission has been altered. The distinction between dollars for fighting drugs and dollars to counter terrorists is important for many reasons but too complex to separate in a civil war situation. There is no simple elegant solution in a civil war. All we have to do is remember or read our own sad history to understand this fact. According to Sanchez, "For a long time any talk of increasing U.S. military aid to Colombia was countered by persistent voices warning of 'mission creep' or a military quagmire."

The case for the similarities of the Colombian left-wing Revolutionary Armed Forces of Columbia (FARC) guerrillas and al-Qaida terrorists will be certainly made in the global press since the FARC are not angelic warriors either. But only careful observation shows that the Colombian military is developing closer ties to the right wing paramilitary groups that have been accused of brutality in many cases. The atrocities of these right wing guerrillas have been documented by human rights groups that condemn the Colombian government for embracing these methods.

The mixing of missions should not be a black and white, right or wrong policy choice for decision makers in a situation as complex as Colombia's. The complexity of this situation warrants a closer look at keeping the drug and terrorism objectives and missions carefully and financially separate in aid and personnel. This is seemingly the opposite view of the Bush administration and the recently passed funding legislation following after 9/11.

U.S. Congressional Democratic opposition will not be easy to sustain considering that these funding increases seem rational on a military basis in this post 9/11 environment. But that is why mission creep is so insidious and dangerous. As we get further involved in Colombia's three-way civil war it can be only a matter of time before our forces and military assets become targets themselves.

Perhaps the Bush administration believes that this is economically efficient to do both of these missions together. But as we prepare to engage Iraq and possibly occupy it, then quell North Korea's compulsion to sell arms, a Colombian confrontation could follow in the war on terrorism, drugs. Or whatever. If it happens, the policy distortion of mission creep will be at least a great portion of the reason.

This is what Gore Vidal meant when he said that we, as a nation, choose perpetual war (military intervention) instead of working toward perpetual peace (curbing our domestic demand for illicit drugs). Civil wars should be left to Colombian domestic forces with direct, domestic grievances—not to the treasury of the only remaining superpower with relatively deep pockets and a blurred agenda.

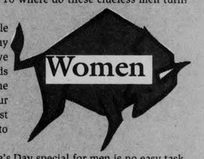
WHICH GENDER IS MORE ROMANTIC?
The Bucknellian editorial board faces off

Compiled By Michelle Dombeck and Andrea Dill
Women's Representatives

The Bucknellian men are going to say that the onus for Valentine's Day is, stereotypically, on them. They have to get flowers, they have to find chocolates and they have to buy dinner at a fancy restaurant, all in an annual (if they have game) effort to make women happy. Don't believe them.

In the typical heterosexual relationship, the fact of the matter is that women do all the work on Valentine's Day, while men do nothing at all. Men are literally handed a day of romance by Hallmark. People complain that Valentine's Day has been bastardized into a "Hallmark holiday," but that is the glory of it for men. It is so simple—they walk into any local shop and there is a display case full of red and pink girly stuff that fits the bill. Send your lady a card, and she'll love you forever. Take her out to dinner, and she'll know that you thought of her. Buy her a ring, because diamonds last forever. And, of course, women play the appropriate part, swooning over any romantic gesture their mates put forth.

If, for some reason, men are clueless about what to get women, they still manage to survive the holiday. To where do these clueless men turn? To women.



Not only are women responsible for finding a way to make the day special for the men in our lives, we also have to supply our guy friends with ideas. Taking into account the particular romantic affinities of our besotted female friends, we must determine what will tickle them to the advantage of the guys.

Finding a way to make Valentine's Day special for men is no easy task. What do you get a man on Valentine's Day? No practical gift makes sense. "Honey, on this Valentine's Day, I got you that new mouse you've been needing." That hardly screams romance.

Instead, the media and advertisers tell us that men want lingerie. Preferably, they want the flesh underneath, but tearing through something slinky, sexy and borderline slutty to get there is an acceptable cost of doing business. Men only really want to see lingerie balled up on their floors. How is that romantic?

Even if men don't get their ladies something sexual, sexuality is often implied in the gifts. "Give her a gift she'll love to unwrap, and maybe she'll unwrap you," claims a radio advertisement.

Most heterosexual men don't want romance; they want women. A candlelit dinner is not going to get a guy's heart pumping, nor is a teddy bear or obscure flower, the meaning of which perfectly describes your relationship.

For the single women out there, Valentine's Day is equally as tricky. Despite going year after year without so much as a bag of Hershey kisses from a boy, single women still hold onto dreams of fairy tales. These dreams are crushed on each and every Feb. 14 when they see other girls in the mailroom opening boxes with heart-shaped balloons popping out of them. When these girls are walking all over campus with their teddy bears and roses, single women have to squelch the urge to pull the hair right out of the lucky ladies' heads because they know that the only thing awaiting them is a lonely room with a chick flick and box of Kleenex.

If women put in most of the work into Valentine's Day and reap few rewards, why do we celebrate it?

The female staffers at The Bucknellian are taking a stand. We're not going to put up with a holiday that's simply a means for your desired end. Don't take us out to dinner or present us with hastily purchased flower bouquets. It's not about money, and it's not about romance. Just show us that you care.

The breeze blows across our faces, our sweatpants ripple as our Reebok pumps carry us across the playground. We are the sultans of the sandbox. We are the sovereigns of the swings. At age 5, the social framework is placed around the male like a child caught in a jungle gym. For the most part, we can't find our way out (we're not endowed with the superior intelligence of our complimentary gender), but there are rare moments when we yearn, and succeed, at being lovers rather than fighters.

Valentine's Day is about women. Men don't ask for anything on these days, save to get out of it with their relationships still intact. For the most part, the acts of love required for this to be possible are not sanctioned by "the brotherhood," because to be "romantic" is to betray one's masculinity. This alone should be testament to the devotion that men display. But alas, it is not. Here is a list of things we have done in the name of Valentine's Day.

When I was 11, I distracted Beth Westerman long enough for Billy Hearst to sneak behind her and give her a kiss on the cheek. Later, he gave her his only piece of cake. She took it and didn't thank him.

When I was 12, I passed a valentine I had spent three years working up the courage to give to a girl I had a crush on. It was a white card, to represent the friendship we already had, with a red heart, to show that there was something better … love.

When I was 14, I took the train into New York City, walked 13 blocks to the other train station and took another train to Long Island, the only way to see you. It cost me seven hours and $20 roundtrip (a month's allowance) just to say "Happy Valentine's Day" to you when you woke up. You went to school and I had to go home. You kissed me. It was worth it.

When I was 15, I made a scrapbook of pictures of you and I bought a photo book and put the only picture that I had of us on the front page. On the next page I put an index card that said, "Let's fill this."

When I was 18, I acted as if I'd forgotten what day it was. When I said goodnight, you were noticeably upset. Five minutes later, you came over to my room with your freshly brushed teeth. "What took you so long?" was all I could ask. We fell asleep in each other's arms, her mattress still hiding in my closet, my necklace, which I had left on her doorknob, was wrapped around her neck.

When I was 19, I went around your room putting Post-it notes on every surface—drawers, shoes, calculator, books. Each Post-it said one thing that I loved about you. Later that night, I got my friends together and we serenaded you outside your dorm window. You didn't hear us at first and we had to do it twice.

In my first year, since I couldn't have a car on campus, I got on the six a.m. Greyhound Tuesday, rode for 12 hours and surprised you at your dorm. Thursday at six a.m., I got back on a Greyhound for another 12 hour trip back to campus.

When I was 20, you were sick. I made you hot soup, set your mattress on the floor and moved my TV into your room. When you got back, we spent the day under the covers, watching movies like "Anne of Green Gables," the movies you watched when you were sick as a kid.

When I was 21, I gave you my blue hat.

We have recorded our voice in picture frames, bought you gifts that were inexpensive but meaningful, compiled CDs that made you cry, videos that made you laugh and have gone to all ends to make a complete fools of ourselves for you.

But above all, women, we have loved you. And even though Valentine's only comes once a year, we have done what we can to show you that love every other day of the year. If, when you get together for lunch with your friends the next day, and our actions don't get you the loudest coo from the rest of the pack, remind them that your man's love could never be expressed in just one day.

English major has direction

By Nicole Wiederspiel
Staff Writer

When I was a child, I was obsessed with my parents' bookshelf. There was some adult secret lurking in those dusty Ikea caves in our living room, I was sure of it. When I was 12 and thoroughly disillusioned with the world around me, I grabbed "The Oxford Anthology of English Poetry" and opened it up. It didn't smell like so many of the other books that my parents owned, a smell that I associated with the '70s and bad television shows.

Anyway, somehow I ended up at T. S. Eliot's "The Waste Land," and due to some excess of adolescent angst, actually began to read it. I don't know—something about April being the cruelest month and ingeniously associating it with my birth—but there it was, wafting through my brain, eliminating all the allusions that I didn't understand but giving credence to the spiritual desert that was called seventh grade. I have been a "literary dork" ever since—and literature has sustained me and protected me from conformity, assimilation and narrow-mindedness with its uncanny ability to speak to me when no one else could.

Years later I go to college, and I become an English major, which unfortunately has made me the butt of jokes, condescension and some pretty ugly bitterness. To dispel some of the nasty rumors and my bitterness, I would just like to say this: English majors are not grammar experts by rule; instead, I study literature, which is integral to countless cultures.

English majors are not grammar experts by rule; instead, I study literature, which is integral to countless cultures.

Literature shapes people's dreams, emotions, and to study it creates a preponderance of questions, though not always answers. I actually do work, and sometimes even my life changes from reading a certain text. I have learned to analyze everything I read. However, I suffer from a serious inferiority complex, as my science, engineering and management friends give me looks of dismay that suggest that I am somehow less intelligent than they are. You try analyzing Faulkner or Joyce—it's difficult, elusive, erudite—but totally worth it.

I don't have another major, but, yes, I do know what I'm going to "do with it." I'm never going to forget my ideals, sell out, work for a corporation or, worse, let people think I am less successful as a person because my real reason for going to college was not to curl myself up in a little box and allow myself to be labeled, placed on a conveyer belt and manufactured to the hungry masses.

No, I don't have any job prospects, and I am fairly sure that I possess little to no skills of any "practical" use. Two summers ago I made the decision not to enter academia, which rendered me speechless when confronted by well-meaning people who wanted to know if they could expect to see me trying to give stoned kids an appreciation for Charles Dickens or whether they could find me in unemployment lines, bitter and bedraggled, wishing I had the sense to learn a trade, like accounting or hairdressing.

Yet I am learning, albeit slowly, that a major is second to meaningless, and that a degree to many is an invitation to stop learning and surrender to an existence that has become satiated by a bank account and prestige. I don't really know where I am going next, but I will not let myself be afraid and pigeonholed into a career that I will eventually hate and that will destroy every dream I once had—the dreams that have followed me since the first time I picked up that anthology and thought that I finally had the power to discover life's mysteries and quirks.

Department limitations stifle students

By Stacey Gawrons
Writer

Enjoying my winter break at home, relaxing during my last few days before returning to the University, I was more than a little annoyed at learning that a hold had been placed on my registration. The hold, one that I had never heard of before, was a Degree Audit Hold, yet offered no explanation. Concerned that I had made a mistake in forgetting about some obscure University requirement that I had yet to take or register for, I panicked and checked my academic progress report online.

Happily, I discovered that everything was as it should be. The foundation seminar; disciplinary breadth; four courses in humanities, not more than two in the same department; three courses in natural sciences and mathematics (specifically two lab sciences and one math, computer science or non-lab science); a broadened perspectives on the 21st century course (whatever that means); a course fulfilling perspectives on the natural and fabricated worlds; one course meeting the perspectives on human diversity requirement; two W2 courses; and my nearly completed double major, which would be fulfilled upon completion of the spring semester. Everything looked good. I had fulfilled or was planning on fulfilling all of the University's requirements.

Assuming that there was a mistake on the registrar's part, I called the office to confirm my status and find out what exactly a degree audit hold referred to. To my chagrin, I was told that the hold on my registration was for taking too many English courses. Yep, that's right, I was signed up for two too many courses in my field of passion.

I asked the woman in the Registrar's Office how the University could dictate what courses a second semester senior takes. I wanted to know how the University could stop me from taking the classes I was most interested in while my parents were paying a ballpark price of $32,500 a year for me to attend school. I could not understand the absurdity of such a restriction. "It's in the student handbook," the frustrated woman told me.

While she couldn't tell me if I would be able to get approved and allowed to take my beloved English courses, she instructed me to meet with the dean of Arts and Sciences. Before my walk-in meeting with the dean (no appointments allowed), I did a bit of research. It seems that there is indeed a 12-course maximum concentration for the Bachelor of Arts degree in certain departments, but not others. In classics, modern languages, literatures, linguistics, anthropology, sociology and theatre and dance, the maximum concentration rule applies only to each of the programs in which a major is offered.

I asked around and discovered that there were many students in the same predicament. We had all fulfilled the University's extensive requirements but were now being told that we could not further pursue our fields of interest. We did, however, have the opportunity to meet with the dean to discuss the issue and plead our individual cases.

Yep, that's right, I was signed up for two too many courses in my field of passion.

Prepared to discuss my frustration with the dean over what I and many others considered a ridiculous policy, I felt like my opportunity was gone, as he seemed extremely agitated and annoyed at having to meet with students all day long to discuss the same problem. And why shouldn't he be agitated and annoyed? There was an overcrowding of students waiting outside his office to meet with him; in fact, there were not even enough seats to house them all.

Instead of voicing my views to the dean, I listened as he told me to type a letter describing my need to take over the maximum concentration in English. I was to get it signed, etc., and then wait for approval. The whole process seemed unnecessary and time-consuming for both the dean and mean.

While many other schools have fewer requirements or no general requirements at all outside a student's major (Brown University, for example), Bucknell needs to examine its University requirements and, consequently, afford its students ample opportunity to pursue their passions. If I had been planning on attending graduate school in my area of study, I would be at a disadvantage in not being allowed to further my English education. It is likely that other students in the same predicament are experiencing this disadvantage.

By the time we are seniors, presumably intelligent enough to know which courses will really pique our interests, shouldn't we be given the right to choose without the unnecessary red tape involved in getting permission?

Tuition increase benefits University students

By Jennifer Jenchura

Even before I wrote articles on the living wage for The Bucknellian and saw firsthand the work behind the many models and spreadsheets developed by fiscal committees, I knew enough to know what the effects of a recession are. But you can't close down the University until the economy is back to normal again. As with many schools, last year investment return wasn't as good and neither were donations. It costs money to operate the University, so in order for the University to go on at the same quality as it has been, the University has to get money from a guaranteed source—tuition.

I don't mind if the trustees congregate for a weekend. Most have donated substantial amounts of money, many times over the cost of going to the Newark Airport for a weekend of financial meetings. In fact, I would rather the trustees get together and use their talents to think tuition through together, rather than just having the school make choices on its own (such as buying a new Bison Express trailer only to sell it before it opened).

To attract good faculty, competitive salaries are needed. Let's face it, the University certainly isn't known for its football team; rather it's known for its academic reputation as an institute of higher learning because of the professors. I want to be able to study with the best scholars out there and want to make sure the University is doing everything it can to hire these professors. If it takes a 2.5 percent salary increase to get them to me, it must be worth it.

With many staff working for not much more than minimum wage I believe University President Steffen Rogers is correct and staff salary increases are also needed.

Lots of money is being used for new facilities. Good! One of the reasons I chose to study at Bucknell was for its top-of-the-line facilities. I do not want buildings that look like they did when my parents went to school. I want technology-efficient, modern buildings and I expect a large part of my tuition to fund those facilities, even if they have to be remodeled, redone or built new.

I want technology-efficient, modern buildings and I expect a large part of my tuition to fund those facilities, even if they have to be remodeled, redone or built new.

Long before the economic downturn the University had already laid out its master plans for construction and more buildings mean more costs, utilities, staff, etc. This wasn't something the University was hiding. Of course these costs extend to Sojka Pavilion, just as there are costs with the other new building on campus, O'Leary.

Did I mention that I love Sojka Pavilion? And, yes, I believe it has increased my educational experience. I have been to every men's and women's basketball game there this season. It might not be as loud and crazy a place as teams in the top 25, but that's the students' job. I believe going to an athletic event in general is an experience and going to an event in beautiful Sojka Pavilion raises the level of commitment to our athletic program.

Like it or not Bucknellians go to a school with a Division I athletic program and many students are athletes. Have you been there? It's a model facility for any Division I school our size to play basketball in, and basketball just happens to be the Patriot League's marquee event.

There are many donating alumni that follow Bucknell sports, not to mention the marketing (and therefore profitable) benefits of having a premier sports venue. ESPN is coming to Bucknell Sunday to broadcast a great women's basketball team, but also to show off our new facilities. You can't pay for this kind of spotlight on Bucknell and it will only help make our University more competitive, which then ultimately makes us closer to the University's main goal—a better higher-learning institution.

I'm sure the sports teams that no longer have to get up at 6 a.m. for some gym time in Davis Gym also don't mind the new facility. I also like the juice bar in the new Recreation and Athletics Center, and with tuition over $30,000 I expect there to be some extra "conveniences."

Although I am certainly not Miss Moneybags I like the quality of life here at Bucknell and would gladly pay more to get more.

Powell presents case to U.N.

U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell gives his presentation on Iraq to the United Nations. Powell appeared before the United Nations to deliver legitimate evidence on Iraq in hopes of engendering U.N. support for military action against Iraqi President Saddam Hussein and his regime.

By Emma Post
Staff Writer

Since the 1970s, Iraqi President Saddam Hussein has faced U.N.-imposed economic sanctions as well as constant conflict with the United States over possessing weapons of mass destruction. Hussein has been a threat to his country's neighbors in the Middle East and to the rest of the world, and the Bush administration believes that Hussein is intent on acquiring chemical, biological and nuclear weapons in order to threaten those around him.

U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell gave a presentation to the U.N. Security Council on Feb. 5, disclosing the evidence that he and the Bush administration feel is persuasive enough to wage war against Iraq and its autocratic leadership.

According to The New York Times, Powell produced legitimate evidence against Iraq, such as satellite pictures taken last year of several known weapon sites that were destroyed in the Gulf War, but have since been rebuilt. Iraq claims that these facilities serve nonmilitary uses, but that is highly questionable.

Iraqi scientists gave firsthand accounts of seven easily concealable mobile biological weapons factories that are disguised as trucks and train cars, reported The New York Times. Inside these "trucks" are storage tanks, mixing tanks and active materials that the United States believes are used to create biological agents. There have also been suspicious activities at a chemical complex called Al Musayyib, which Iraq uses to ship chemical weapons from production facilities, MSNBC.com reported.

Iraq's most offensive act, according to Powell, is breaking U.N. Resolution 1441, which was passed last November, requiring Iraq to disarm its weapons of mass destruction or prove that it already has. Iraq has the opportunity to avoid war by turning over all documents concerning its weapons and making all of its scientists and engineers available for interviews.

Hans Blix and Mohamed El Baradei, the chief U.N. weapons inspector, will present their third report to the U.N. Security Council today, according to The New York Times.

If Hussein is still not cooperating with the United Nations, Powell said to The New York Times that U.S. President George W. Bush would immediately press for consideration of a security resolution authorizing the possible use of force against Iraq.

The problem, according to The New York Times, is that Great Britain is the only close ally of the United States that feels attacking Iraq is necessary. France and Germany are pushing for extended Iraqi inspections because they believe that there is not strong evidence that weapons exist. As permanent members of the United Nations, these two countries have the power to veto any resolution authorizing the use of force against Iraq. Instead of attacking Iraq, France and Germany may propose sending as many as 2,000 U.N. peacekeeping troops to Iraq to assist weapons inspectors. Powell feels that the United Nations has the wrong end goals.

"This idea of more inspectors, or a no fly zone, or whatever else maybe in this proposal that is being developed is a diversion, not a solution," Powell said, according to NBC News.

Despite the lack of support from the international community, Powell still said that the United States would take military action even without the support of the United Nations.

Powell said on "Meet the Press," "If conflict comes, we would hope to do it quickly, we would hope to do it with a minimum of destruction and a minimum loss of civilian life, and we would remove a despotic regime."

Ideally, a new government would be implemented, one that would include three major groups: the Kurds, Sunnies and Shi'ites. This would hopefully improve conditions in Iraq and set the precedent for a more stable region in the Middle East.

The third report to the United Nations will determine the course of action for the United States. Time is running out, and the United States feels that countries like France and Germany are only delaying the inevitable. With new allegations that Hussein is now connected to al-Qaida and 9/11, according to MSNBC.com, he is becoming more of a problem with each passing day.

As Bush said, according to CNN.com, "Saddam Hussein is a threat. He's a threat to the United States of America. He's a threat to some of our closest friends and allies. We don't accept this threat."

Turkish dispute heightens Iraqi war tensions

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

The road leading the world towards a conflict in Iraq has not been a smooth one. There have been complaints that the United States is bullying the international community and putting pressure on Iraq to be more receptive to U.N. weapons inspectors. Toss in U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell's speech to the United Nations and North Korea rattling its sabers in Asia. All this makes you wonder, "What's next?"

The answer came Monday morning when Belgium, along with France and Germany, vetoed a Turkish request at NATO headquarters in Brussels for defense, should a war in Iraq begin. This latest hurdle for the Bush administration may be the toughest one yet because it comes in a more important arena—NATO.

According to The Washington Post, the United States and Turkey came to an agreement over the weekend that would prepare Turkey for war. Turkey is vital for the United States to protect; as a direct Iraqi neighbor, it would be immediately affected by any conflict. The agreement will allow approximately 3,500 troops into the country to modernize airports, bases and seaports for later U.S. usage.

The Turkish Parliament will vote soon on whether or not to allow more U.S. troops to be stationed in Turkey in order to fight from a northern position, The Washington Post reported. This front is crucial to the United States because it will occur along the 218-mile border Turkey shares with Iraq.

The Washington Post reported that the bases the United States will work to upgrade are at Incirlik, Diyarbakir and Batman.

NATO's 19 members met in Brussels to plan a response to any Iraqi counterattack. MSNBC.com reported that France, Germany and Belgium vetoed the planning process because any aid "would signify that ... any chance, any initiative to still resolve the conflict in a peaceful way was gone."

Turkey is working to defend itself despite the problems posed by the NATO veto. According to The Washington Post, it has invoked Article IV of NATO's charter, which states, "The parties will consult together whenever, in the opinion of any of them, the territorial integrity, political independence or security of any of the parties is threatened." By invoking this article (the first time it has ever been used), Turkey will force the alliance to talk about the threat Iraq poses.

MSNBC.com reported on Monday "French President Jacques Chirac ... and Russian President Vladimir Putin said that Iraq's weapons capability had to be neutralized as quickly as possible but insisted that waging war to achieve the objective should be considered only as a last resort."

Meanwhile, the United States maintains that it will not accept any new resolutions the French or Russians may care to introduce to the United Nations. U.S. President George W. Bush has said repeatedly that he will act unilaterally, if he has to, in order to protect the American people. He sent Powell to the United Nations to provide evidence of Iraq's attempts to cover up its weapons programs.

"The issue is not more inspectors. The issue is compliance on the part of Saddam Hussein," Powell said on "Meet the Press."

CNN reported that the president is unhappy with the decision by NATO members to veto defense planning for one of its allies.

"I don't understand that decision. It affects the alliance in a negative way ... when you are not able to make a statement of mutual defense," Bush said, according to CNN.

The Turkey debate highlights the rift between the nations seeking war and those opposing it. It also threatens to weaken or dissolve the NATO alliance at a critical time. The debate between the United States and its allies within NATO may force the United States to find a new group of allies that agrees with its policies.

Many fear that this debate will undermine progress. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld downplayed this idea when he said that this type of strain has happened before, according to MSNBC.com. The administration and NATO will see their resolves tested, as a possible war gets closer, because the war opponents will begin to speak louder.

Unemployment rates still fluctuating

By Michelle Johnson
Staff Writer

The U.S. Labor Department announced on Feb. 7 a slight drop in the national unemployment rate from 6 percent to 5.7 percent during the month of January. Though the decrease is not significant enough to indicate an end to the recession that began in 2001, it does give economists reason to be cautiously optimistic at the prospect that at least the economy may stabilize.

David A. Wyss, chief economist of the S&P 500, said to The Washington Post, "Employment is basically flat, which is a better picture than we thought we were seeing a month ago."

A total of 143,000 jobs were added last month. This is the highest monthly gain the nation has seen since 2000 and nearly compensated for those jobs that were lost in December 2002, according to The New York Times.

The explanation offered by economists concerning these newly released statistics could be attributed to the retail sector. Since many stores did not hire temporary employees before the holiday season, it was not necessary for them to fire their temporary employees in January.

Bill Cheney, the chief economist of John Hancock Financial Services, called this "the biggest component of the gains," according to The Washington Post.

Though the economy has continued to exhibit weak growth since the end of 2001, the jobless rate is still at a 20-year high. The percentage of people who are not in the work force—not accounted for in the unemployment decrease—rose once again last month. Unlike the unemployment rate, this percentage takes into account not only the people looking for work, but also those who are not currently seeking employment.

Despite the general economic downturn in the past year, there are still some industries experiencing a fair amount of growth. Restaurants, airlines, financial service companies, hospitals and government agencies added to their work forces in January. The field of private education also prospered, adding 11,000 new jobs, according to The Washington Post. Cutbacks in employment were considerable for car dealerships, manufacturers and state governments.

After the Labor Department released these statistics, the stock market fell due to a reported lack of confidence in the numbers. In order to stimulate the floundering economy, the Bush administration is proposing that the $1.35 trillion tax cut of 2001 be made permanent and that the dividend tax be abolished. CNN reported that Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan was hesitant to agree that such a stimulus package was necessary when much of the current economic uncertainty can be attributed to the lingering possibility of war with Iraq.

Bison drop second straight

The Bucknell men's basketball team dropped its second consecutive Patriot League game 70-56 at American on Feb. 8. After a solid 4-2 league start, the squad found itself at 10-11, 4-4 following the loss. The Bison looked for revenge on Feb. 11 at Lehigh, against a team that stunned the Orange and Blue on the evening of the opening of Sojka Pavilion.

Speaking of payback, American avenged its lopsided January loss to the Bison and moved ahead of Bucknell in the league standings, improving to 5-3. It was Glenn Stokes and Steven Miles stealing the show, as they combined for 46 points and propelled the Eagles to shoot 51 percent from the floor. They also were a solid 9 for 20 from beyond the arch. Boakai Lalugba '03 and Jordan Hardenbergh '03 attempted to reason why the Eagles shot the lights out.

"They shot the ball really well," Lalugba said. "We gave their two best shooters way too many open shots, bottom line. To win games on the road you have to contain the other teams' best players and we didn't do that as a team."

Hardenbergh also saw room for improvement in his team's play.

The men's swimming and diving team completed its dual meet season with a 4-2 record. The team has won its last three meets, defeating Patriot League competitors Lafayette, Colgate and Lehigh.

The team now looks to the Patriot League Championship, which will be held here Feb. 20 until Feb. 22. Other Patriot League schools include American, Army, and Holy Cross.

Last year, Lehigh came home victorious. American and Army claimed 2nd and 3rd place, respectively, while Bucknell captured 4th. All members of the men's swim team will be expected to contribute in order for Bucknell to be successful. The team is comprised of six seniors, six juniors, four sophomores and nine freshmen; much can be expected of the team next year as well.

The University is hoping to capitalize on this team depth, as well as the advantage of swimming in its new home, the Kinney Natatorium. The Bison look to place higher than 4th this year in this meet and conclude the season on a high note.

As opposed to dual meets, this meet will be held in a trials and finals format. The trials portion will begin at 10:30 a.m. The diving trials will start at 12:30 p.m. The fastest 16 swimmers will return that evening at 6:00 p.m. to swim the same events they swam that morning. The consolation finals contain seeds 9-16, while the finals have the top 8 seeds in them. There are no relays for the trials session; instead there is one heat that will be swum at night. The diving finals will also begin at 6:00 p.m.

At the conclusion of the three-day meet, special awards will be given out for coaches of the year award, the swimmers and divers of the year awards, and the team awards.

Longtime lacrosse coach inducted into Pennsylvania Lacrosse Hall of Fame

In the University's 35 years of men's lacrosse, it has only needed one coach to take the program from its grassroots beginnings to its current, nationally recognized status. As the 36th season approaches, Head Men's Lacrosse Coach Sid Jamieson will once again lead a talented group of players in their quest for a Patriot League Championship and an NCAA berth.

In his career at the University, Jamieson has guided his teams to an impressive six conference titles in three different leagues, including the last three Patriot League Championships, making the University an annual top-25 program. For his success, Jamieson recently became only the second coach in state history to be inducted into the Pennsylvania Lacrosse Hall of Fame.

"We are all a reflection of the experiences that have influenced us, so this honor is a testament to all the wonderfully positive things that I have experienced at Bucknell," Jamieson said. "This, of course, is not a singular honor, but it represents all of the alumni, their parents and our friends who have made this day possible."

Maybe the greatest accolade in Jamieson's coaching career came in 1996 when he was named Division I Coach of the Year after leading the Bison to an almost unheard of undefeated season.

"The undefeated season in 1996 was an accomplishment very rarely experienced by anyone in this level," Jamieson said. "It wasn't me that did it, it was the players that came together. The guys on that team had excellent leadership and had personalities that absolutely refused to lose games."

Jamieson sees the same characteristics in his players now. This year's team boasts nine starting seniors, including preseason All-America selections goalie Justin Sussman, who is this year's co-captain, and attack Dennis Geraghty, who is only two goals shy of breaking the University all-time scoring record.

Head Men's Lacrosse Coach Sid Jamieson has guided his teams to an impressive six conference titles in three different leagues, including the last three Patriot League Championships.

"We've got great leadership this year," Jamieson said. "Our players are highly competitive and our seniors know how to put things together."

Although last year's team won the Patriot League Championship, which is normally an automatic NCAA bid, it was not able to advance because of a late loss to league rival Hobart 13-12, which put the Bison into a tiebreaker that they lost. This year's team believes it has what it takes to avenge last year's losses and gain a spot in the NCAA Tournament.

"On paper we're as good as any team in Bucknell history," Sussman said. "There's no comparison to last year's team. We have better leadership and everyone is pushing each other constantly. We're better in every facet of the game."

Sussman was the winner of the 2002 Patriot League Defensive Player of the Year Award after allowing an average of only 8:85 goals against him per game. Co-captaining with Sussman is Andrew Sanders '03, who scored 29 points last season, ranking him 12th best in the Patriot League.

"Our whole senior class is leading by example in everything we do," Sanders said. "And on top of that we've got a great bunch of young guys to fill in the gaps."

Among that young talent is last year's Patriot League Rookie of the year, Chris Cara '05, who will team up with Geraghty to lead the offensive firepower. Last year Cara was ranked 5th nationally in assists and 6th in scoring, breaking the 26-year-old University first-year scoring record.

Kent State's oversized track gave Bucknell's track and field team a chance to improve their Patriot League and IC4A/ECAC seed times this past weekend. The combination of having a full month of quality speed training, being pushed by top competition and having longer straightaways with more gradual turns, helped more than 30 athletes run seasonal and, in many cases, personal bests.

In a number of events, teammates keyed off each other to push the limits. Noel Powell '04 and Ryan Newberger '04 improved on their IC4A

Equestrian team looks to continue trend of success

By Cecily Cairns
Sports Editor

The University equestrian team is gearing up for the second portion of its 2002-2003 season, which will commence on March 2 when the team hosts the first of five regular shows. The equestrian team, which operates as a club sport at Bucknell, is currently thriving with 35 members of varying experience and skill levels.

The riders train throughout the academic year at privately owned Summer Breeze Stables in Milton, Pa., where they take weekly lessons from trainer Jan Phillips. The athletes train in a group with three or four other riders of roughly the same skill level, and can choose from several lesson times to accommodate for academic commitments.

Fifteen years ago, Bucknell's equestrian team barely had a pulse, fielding only eight members, but has since grown into a highly successful and flourishing squad. The show team is a perennial threat in its region, and has previously sent individuals on to compete in Zone and National Championship competitions.

A member of Zone 3, Region 4, the team competes against schools such as Princeton, Rutgers, University of Scranton, Kutztown and Lehigh. All members of Bucknell's team compete in Hunt Seat competition, but are placed in varying divisions according to their skill levels, which range from beginner to advanced.

Out of the 35 riders on the team, between 15 and 20 members travel to each show. Riders can choose to show in all five shows, just some of the shows or not show at all.

"The great part about intercollegiate riding is that riders do not have to compete in every show if they do not want to," co-captain Kim Lorenz '03 said. "Sometimes a rider might only want to show once or twice to get their feet wet, but do not want to commit to showing as competitively as others."

The team hopes to repeat its superb efforts last season, in which the squad achieved High Point status in all five of its regular competitions and went on to finish 1st in the region as well. The team then advanced to Zone Championships, where they finished 3rd—an extremely impressive feat considering that there are over 60 colleges in Zone 3. Individually, six riders qualified for Regionals, five for Zones and one for Nationals.

One of the reasons for the team's recent success is the expertise and tenacity of Phillips, who has coached the team for 15 years and had taught lessons to Bucknell students in the years prior to that. Phillips is a graduate and instructor from the British Horse Society, and has trained many horses and riders to qualify for and succeed in such prestigious shows as Devon, Harrisburg and Hampton Classic.

Phillips admits to being tough on team members, throwing frequent challenges at them and exposing them to a variety of difficult mounts. Riding a different horse each lesson helps prepare the team members for Intercollegiate Horse Show Association competitions, which require that each rider be paired at random with a horse provided by the host team.

"I try to put them on every different personality," Phillips said. "I try to make them learn to ride the match that they might get at a horse show."

Horses at Summer Breeze Stable accommodate several different skill levels, with several different personalities available for each level. Riders are exposed to a unique challenge with each horse, as each equine has his or her own quirks—some may be quick or skittish, while others are stubborn and need to be urged on. It is imperative that a rider be able to quickly adapt to these different traits in order to achieve in IHSA competitions.

As the season gets underway, the Bucknell riders are confident that they can repeat the success of recent seasons.

"We have talented riders, a variety of horses to practice on, and a great coach," Missy Turner '03 said. "There is no doubt in my mind that our team will do well his spring."

Cecily Cairns—The Bucknellian

Collegiate competition is unique

Intercollegiate equestrian competitions are held according to the rules and standards of the Intercollegiate Horse Show Association (IHSA), an organization established in 1967. The IHSA is a member of USA Equestrian (USAE), the national governing body of equestrian sport in the United States, which oversees the nation's most prestigious equestrian competitions, and the American Quarter Horse Association (AQHA). IHSA competitions differ from other national competitions in their format, making the collegiate experience a unique one for young equestrians.

One of the difficulties associated with horseback riding in its various forms is the limitations its places on its participants because of financial demands. Owning, boarding, caring for and transporting a horse is not affordable for many college students, a factor that would ordinarily limit the participation in equestrian clubs. The IHSA standards are designed to allow riders of varying skill levels and financial status to participate and succeed.

Participants are not required to own or lease their own horse. Member teams take turns hosting shows, and the team that hosts the show provides the horses. All participating riders will ride one of those horses, based on a random pairing right before competition.

All participants compete on a horse they have never seen or ridden before, eliminating the discrepancy between those who own horses and those who don't, as well as relieving teams from the difficulty of transporting horses to the show. They also must use the tack provided by the host school.

The IHSA offers competition in the two main disciplines of English (hunt seat) and western, and four basic classes—equitation on the flat (the rider is judged on skills at the walk, trot and canter), equitation over fences (the rider is judged on skills over jumps), western horsemanship and reining.

Shows are further divided into several classes—generally eight for hunt seat and five for western—based on skill level, ranging from extreme beginner classes to highly advanced classes over fences. Riders are awarded points for their placement in each class, beginning with seven points for 1st place, five for 2nd, four for 3rd, three for 4th, two for 5th and one for 6th. After accumulating 35 points at one level, a rider moves on to the next level.

Each member team in the IHSA is assigned to a zone based on its location in the country, and each zone is divided into no more than five regions. Riders strive to advance from regular point shows to Regional Championships, where the 1st, 2nd and, in some regions, 3rd place riders in each class may advance to zone championships. All riders who place 1st and 2nd in their respective classes then become eligible to compete at the National Horse Show, held annually in the first weekend of May.

Hunt seat teams designate eight riders from different levels as point riders and western teams designate five riders. The points scored by the top seven riders will be added up to constitute the team's overall score in hunter competition, while the points of all five riders in western competition are added together. The winning team from each Regional Championship—based on the cumulative scores of all eight hunt seat point riders or all five western point riders—advances to the Zone Championship.

Smaller zones (consisting of 500 or less individual riders for hunt seat, or 200 or less riders for western) send the top-scoring team to the National Horse Show, while larger zones (over 500 individuals for hunter; from 200-400 riders for western) may send the top two teams. In western competition, zones with over 400 individual riders may send the top three teams. The scores of the eight designated riders in hunt seat competition or five designated riders in western competition are added up to determine the point totals for each team, upon which the naming of the National College Champion team is based.

The IHSA currently consists of nine zones, a total of over 300 member colleges and universities and over 6,200 individual riders, making it the world's largest intercollegiate equestrian organization. Most teams operate as club sports, but several universities have granted their teams status as fully funded varsity sports, a trend that will probably continue as the popularity of collegiate equestrian athletics continues to grow.

A look at equine sports

Cecily Cairns—The Bucknellian

Coach Jan Phillips greets equine athlete La Monte. Horses play an important role in many sports.

Hunt seat equitation is just one of the many horse-related sports that provide entertainment for people worldwide. Here is a quick overview of some equine sports.

Eventing: Eventing combines three English-style horse sports, including dressage, cross country jumping and stadium jumping. Dressage demands that the rider guide his or her horse through a complex and graceful pattern of motions in a flat arena. It requires the horse to be not only athletic, but extremely nimble and attentive to its rider's subtle commands. Cross-country jumping is a rigorous sport in which horse and rider must speed over a hilly course with large fences, embankments and water-pits. Stadium jumping takes place in an enclosed rink where the rider must guide his or her horse over a tricky combination of large, flashy jumps. Knocking down or refusing a fence results in the accumulation of "faults" for the horse and rider. Dressage, cross-country and stadium jumping are all held as separate events during the Olympics, in addition to eventing, which combines the sports so that competitors are scored on their performance in all three. Equestrian sports are the only Olympic event in which men and women compete against each other on even grounds.

Endurance Riding: Endurance rides are the marathons of the horse racing world—horse and rider teams usually travel from 25-100 miles in a single day, or as many as 300 miles over multiple days. Any breed of horse is eligible to compete, but steady, strong horses are best suited for the hilly and rocky trails that the course of the race follows.

Racing: Horseracing, in its various forms, has been one of the world's most popular sports for centuries. The most popular type of racing is Thoroughbred racing, a sport celebrated in countries across the globe. Thoroughbreds are the fleetest horses over distances ranging from .625 miles to 2 miles and draw a wide variety of fans to the track. The fastest breed of horse in the world is the Quarter Horse, raced over much shorter distances. Although not as glamorous as Thoroughbred racing, Quarter Horse racing is popular in many parts of the United States. Harness racing requires that the horse, usually a Standardbred, remain at either the trot or the pace (both two-beat gaits) while pulling a light, two-wheeled cart called a sulky, in which the driver sits and guides his horse in and out of traffic. One of the most dramatic and dangerous forms of racing is the steeplechase—more popular in Europe than in the United States—which sends horses over massive shrub hurdles, some with water pits, that are spaced out over 2- or 3-mile courses.

Rodeo: The rodeo is a celebrated part of American culture, steeped in traditions of the Old West. One of the most spectacular and dangerous events is bareback bronc riding. Competitors must try to remain seated on a feisty unbroken horse while it bucks, spins and tries to unseat the cowboy. The rider must stay on for 8 seconds, after which he is judged on his form and the difficulty of the ride. Another popular and extremely challenging event is calf roping, during which the horse and rider team must pursue and rope the calf. Then the rider must dismount, "flank" the calf (lay it down on its side) and tie three of its legs together. All of this must be completed in a short time period, and precision and synchrony between horse and rider is a must. Barrel racing is a less violent, but also difficult, event in which the rider must guide his or her horse around three or four barrels as quickly as possible. The horse must be extremely nimble to make sharp, fast turns around the barrels.

Fox hunting: A sport with rich tradition among the financially elite, fox hunting has experienced decline in recent decades due to the uproar it caused from animal rights activists. Riders follow a pack of foxhounds across the rolling countryside as the dogs pursue a fox. Recent versions of the sport send the hounds after a previously placed fox scent, and the actually animal is never chased or killed. This sport is most popular in Great Britain, but has a healthy following in other countries.

Polo: Polo is one of the world's oldest team sports, played as long ago as 200 B.C. in Persia. Each team consists of four riders, each mounted on a relatively small, athletic and powerful horse called a "polo pony" (even if the horse is tall enough to be considered a horse). The object is similar to soccer or hockey, as riders must send the ball between two goal posts on one end of the field. The players, each of whom has a special designated role, manipulate the ball using a long mallet. Polo is a fast-paced and physical sport—riders can bump one another as they jostle for access to the ball. Although polo is a sport that is generally restricted to wealthy participants, it continues to grow in popularity.

From 60 to zero in no time flat

The onslaught of hype and speculation about LeBron James has stirred up a sudden historical enthusiasm for some otherwise uncelebrated facets of the past. Publications can't seem to resist reminiscing about phenom flops of yesteryear, and if they aren't writing about those poor souls, it's because they're too busy compiling lists of infamous suspensions, bans and catastrophic foul-ups of the past.

Both categories have a rich history, so it isn't hard to compile a list of the vast slew of misfortunate athletes who are destined to be synonymous with disappointment or self-destruction. One athlete comes to mind whose name could find a home on either list.

Denny McLain will always be remembered for the speed at which he went from "dominator" to "disaster," as well as for the misbehavior that landed him two suspensions, a few federal convictions and, eventually, incarceration. He'll be remembered for landing himself in a vortical downward spiral that is quite possibly unrivaled in sports history.

Of course, he'll also be remembered as the only pitcher to win 30 games in a season since 1934. Somehow McLain managed to do something that no one else in a nearly 70-year span—not Koufax, not Feller, not Marichal—could pull off. In the past decade, no one's even come close, and chances are they won't anytime soon.

McLain's 31 wins in 1968 with the Detroit Tigers will forever be his hallmark, but his story—his drama—encompasses a lot more than that single season.

His career didn't exactly blaze out of the gate after the Tigers acquired him off of waivers from the White Sox in 1963. His first couple of seasons saw him dabble in the majors and struggle with injuries, but somewhere along the lines, the happy-go-lucky right-hander learned how to work a change-up and curveball into his repertoire.

In 1965, he logged a pleasantly surprising 16-6 record with a 2.61 ERA, and continued to drill his way through the next two seasons, despite arm problems, with 20-14 and 17-16 records, respectively. At the end of 1967, McLain was budding into a menace for batters all over the American League.

He was also budding into a white-collar criminal.

He missed the last two weeks of that season—weeks that turned out to be crucial for his Tigers, who lost the pennant to the Red Sox by one game—with an unexplainable foot injury. He claimed that he had simply tweaked something when he tried to walk on the appendage after it had "fallen asleep." Truth is, it didn't fall asleep; it was put to sleep—stomped on—by an irate mobster who wanted to send the young star a message about late payments.

Detroit's marvelous twirler was quietly slipping into the seamy black hole of obsessive gambling, racketeering and womanizing. And at the time, nobody would have guessed it by watching him pitch.

1968 was successful at sweeping the dubiosity of his moral judgment under the proverbial rug. He completed 28 of 41 starts, struck out 280, walked only 63 and compiled an ERA of 1.96. He only lost 6 games, and with his 31 victories, became the first—and only—pitcher since Dizzy Dean to win over 30 games.

He was named unanimous American League MVP and awarded the Cy Young Award.

Even in an era that was undoubtedly pitcher-friendly, it was a sparkling set of statistics. Too good to be a fluke. At 24, the kid was simply meteoric.

Within two years, his flirt with immortality was grounded. The spark, the glitter and the promise of his career had simply imploded, and all that was left was a smattering of rubbly meteorites, the fragments of what could have been.

Statistically speaking, the 1969 season solidified McLain's status as a star. He went 24-9 with a 2.80 ERA and took home a piece of a second Cy Young Award. But his behavior was becoming obviously derelict. He skipped workouts and showed up late on game days. He placed bookmaking phone calls from the Tigers' clubhouse telephone.

In 1970, the bottom dropped out. Commissioner Bowie Kuhn suspended him for three months on account of a previous bookmaking involvement, and then again at the end of the season for waving an unregistered gun in a Chicago restaurant.

He could only scrape together a 3-5 record in 1970. Exacerbating, or perhaps exacerbated by, his pitching difficulties, McLain's downward spiral landed him in bankruptcy, even with his hefty $100,000 salary.

In 1971, he went 10-22 with the laughable Washington Senators. McLain managed to put a reverse on the "impossible dream" concept—it was the impossible nightmare: from the league lead to the basement in two years. He became the only pitcher to win 30 games in one season and lose 20 in another.

He pitched his last major-league game for the Atlanta Braves in 1972, at the age of 28. He had burned his candle at both ends and simply ran out of wick. There was nowhere for the flame to go but into thin air. Or prison.

His troubles didn't fade away with his career. In 1985, he was slapped with federal charges involving racketeering, conspiracy, extortion and possession and distribution of cocaine. Sentenced 23 years, he only served a little over two before being released on parole.

In 1996, he was convicted of embezzling pension funds from Peet Packing Company, a meatpacking company he purchased two years earlier. He was hit with an eight-year sentence, which he wasn't able to weasel his way out of.

And that's where baseball's last 30-game winner sits right now: the McLean Federal Correctional Institution. The closest thing to baseball he sees is an occasional prison-league softball game, which he watches from the sidelines.

It's hard to decide whether to deprecate his legacy on the basis that the grave-digging shovel was in his hands and his hands alone, or to pity him. He was just a lost soul, affable by most counts, always upbeat and sure that he could accomplish anything he wanted. Hard to condemn a guy like that.

He once said he'd love to be Frank Sinatra.

"He has power," McLain said. "That's what I want."

McLain needed power. It brought him fame, brought him shame, thrilled him, cursed him, obsessed him and delighted him. Power, to McLain, was like a best friend.

Of course, with friends like that, who needs enemies?

Respect the entertainer

"Aww, look at how cute he is! Let's get a picture with him. Wow, look at how high he jumped!" We've all said it. We've wanted that furry creature to come over to shake our hand or give us a bear hug. The happiness they can bring to you, what a job. Ah, to be a mascot. Easy profession? Maybe ... if you think Joe Millionaire's "real life" job is. So think you have what it takes to be a mascot?

"People say, 'Oh, I could be a mascot, I have a lot of energy,'" said Paul Pierson, a mascot with the Atlanta Braves and the Harlem Globetrotters. "Well, you could have a lot of energy. But if it's 80 degrees, you're operating at 120. And you have to keep your wits about you, because you're running up steps with little kids that you can't see all around. Plus, you have to entertain the crowd, be physically active, worry about breaking a leg." Here's a suggestion for Stein, for next year's NBA All-Star game. How about we add a slam dunk contest between the mascots? I mean these guys can perform at high levels doing wicked double flipping, canon ball spinning maneuvers, almost always hitting their target—the basket.

In high school I always thought it would be neat to be our school mascot—the Somerville Pioneer—wearing the Davey Crocket outfit and carrying around our musket. I mean, I was one active kid, and I continued this outward happiness in college, which led fellow Resident Assistants pointing me to cheerleading tryouts. Bring it on! But after reading a few articles on the working conditions of mascots, I find myself soaking in the pleasure of being entertained.

So what do mascots have to contend with? First, the sweltering heat. The average mascot suit increases the temperature 40 degrees above the external temperature. Dedicated as they are, sometimes they go too far and put themselves in danger. Case and point, a few years ago, Baltimore Orioles mascot Bromley Lowe became so dehydrated during a Fourth of July parade that he ended up in an ambulance, hooked up to an IV bag. In an ironic twist, some of the kids joined him on the ambulance to comfort poor Lowe.

The spring season and, yes, even the summer are approaching. Wouldn't it be great to shed a few pounds to fit into that new outfit? Try being a mascot for a few games. It's reported that the average mascot sheds 9 pounds off each performance! To ease the load, Lowe and fellow Orioles mascots Steven Butz and John Krownapple usually alternate half-hour shifts on game days. They also keep the fridge in the Camden Yards mascot locker room stocked with 64-ounce bottles of Powerade.

Next, how about the injuries? More than half of all mascots have been stricken with a heat-related injury. Also, 44 percent of mascots suffer from chronic lower back pain. And finally, not surprisingly, almost one-fifth have sustained knee injuries while working. Even more telling is the a report by Dr. Edward McFarland, director of sports medicine and shoulder surgery at Johns Hopkins and the author of a study on mascot injuries, which notes an increase of mascots being hit in the 'nads. "That's just about the right height for kids to punch. They think they're aiming for the stomach. But they're not," McFarland said. I wonder if "The Cup" will be reinstated as required mascot attire.

If little kids were not enough to watch out for, what about the grown-ups? Surely they have consideration and understand how hard, yet fulfilling, a job mascots have. Well, in 1999, a Philadelphia electrician shoved Krownapple off the right field wall at Camden Yards. The Orioles mascot fell 15 feet, broke his left ankle and spent a month in a wheelchair. He later won a $59,000 judgment against his assailant.

While on the subject of injuries, what hockey fan can forget when Edmonton Oilers Coach Craig MacTavish tore out the tongue of Calgary Flames mascot Harvey the Hound a few weeks back? With sub .500 win percentages in their past 10 games, maybe MacTavish was angered that Harvey could do a better job of coaching the Oilers. I know at my local Double-A baseball stadium, the mascot has staff personnel following it just to protect against these sorts of situations of player/coach/fan altercations!

So how well off are they? Working with the Braves last year, Pierson garnered $65 a game. Blank earned $45 per night in the minor leagues. Not exactly superstar salaries considering they are sometimes the most exciting aspect of the sporting event.

But loving what you do, and being able to impress your date without the usual "I'm a programmer or business consultant" response can really spice up your relationship life.

Longer than a prostate exam

If there's anything the NBA doesn't need, it's more playoff games. One of two sports whose postseason is longer than the reign of the Louises in France, the NBA has decided to extend their already excruciatingly long postseason by another two games.

Formerly, the NBA playoffs were four rounds, best of 5-7-7-7, respectively. The players association agreed to extend the first round of the playoffs by two games, to be effective this year.

This decision has its merits. Best-of-five games series are often inaccurate judges of a team's ability. We shall call them the standardized tests of the athletic world. They are painful, they are boring and, in the end, everyone feels screwed.

The reason that the first round was only five games to begin with is known only to the most diehard of NBA fanatics. Since I am not one of those people, I'm going to make something up: the best-of-five format is actually a throwback to Wilt Chamberlain.

Chamberlain, who still holds the record for most points in a game (100) and most rebounds in a game (55), obviously had an affinity for the number five and, after long deliberation with then-NBA commissioner J. Edgar Hoover, decided to add an extra round to the playoffs in the best-of-five format. Longtime friend of Chamberlain, Pete Rose, praised the move, saying that it would allow for greater fan interaction with the sport. Walt Disney was quoted as saying "This is the best thing to happen to basketball since "Space Jam."

Back to the merits of the decision, best-of-five series are often boring in the eyes of the public, with games played too far apart to create any dramatic tension between teams. In fact, I would go so far as to suggest that the best-of-five format was a ploy to allow lower quality teams a chance to advance in the playoffs.

The best example I can think of is in baseball (which has the same playoff format of 5-7-7-7) where last year's New York Yankees were silenced by the now-World Champion Anaheim Angels. As much as it pains me to say, the Yankees were a better team overall, though their strength was in their depth, and depth is something completely unnecessary in a five-game series.

So if seven-game series are better judicators of talent, then why, do you ask, would we have five-game series? Well, for one, they are more interesting because it shows a true test of metal for a team that has to match wits, your best against the other team's best, rather than relying on a bench, the fifth man in a pitching rotation or something of that sort to decide the game.

Additionally, they give lower-quality teams a chance. In the first round, the 1st-place team always plays the last-place team. Without some sort of measure put in place, these games wouldn't be watched solely because it would be about as much fun watching bread rise. Five games allows a team like Anaheim to beat a team like New York.

When it comes down to fundamentals, the team that shows up will always win. Shooting myself in the foot here, the New York Yankees were NOT the best team in baseball—the Angels were, because when it comes down to it, it's all a matter of who has the ring and who's eating Cheetos on the couch for a month, too depressed to go out to buy milk.

Another factor is simply length. Last year's NBA finals began on April 20 and didn't end until June 13, and the Lakers swept the Nets in the finals, meaning that the season would have been extended to the June 19. That's two full months of playoffs and the potential for 89 games. That's a healthy number considering a single season is only 82 games.

And the number one reason why this is a bad idea: profit. I'm tired of these decisions being driven by money. How much more can you suck out of me and my family? In baseball, everything is about money (the only reason it's not my favorite sport). It's different with football. With strict caps, revenue sharing and the like, it's no wonder football has its financial act together. Though the NBA isn't as financially bad as baseball, this is just another indicator of priorities on the part of the players union.

The NBA's main problem is the rise of the high school ballplayer and I have no qualms in suggesting that this playoff-restructuring is a part of some sort of cult, underground process for the arrival of LeBron James. Speaking of which 132 days, 2 hours, 47 minutes, 11 seconds until he's drafted. Cross your fingers.

The woes of the NHL—team locations, points and playoffs

By Mark Walker
Staff Writer

The Nashville Predators defeated the Columbus Blue Jackets 3-2 at the Gaylord Entertainment Center in Nashville, Tenn., Saturday.

"It was a real disappointing loss. It was a huge two points for both teams," Blue Jacket's left-winger Geoff Sanderson said following the game.

Sanderson's quote, referring to the matchup between Columbus and Nashville, sums up everything that is wrong with the NHL today. Coming into the game, the Blue Jackets and Predators were in 14th and 5th place, respectively, in the five-team Central Division. If these two teams occupy the basement of the division, how could Sanderson possibly consider this game "huge"?

The fact of the matter is that this game did indeed have playoff implications. Eight of the 15 teams in the NHL's Western Conference receive a berth into the playoffs. Despite being two of the three worst teams in the conference and sitting five games below .500 well past the halfway point of the season, both Nashville and Columbus still have a legitimate shot at the playoffs. Following the game, Nashville and Columbus sat only nine and 10 points, respectively, out of a playoff position.

The NHL must cut the number of playoff teams to four per conference because teams below .500 at this point in the season should not be in serious playoff contention. By allowing 16 of the league's 30 teams into the playoffs, the NHL's regular season becomes nearly meaningless and, in turn, hurts attendance.

Many fans, especially those of teams in the upper echelon of the league, do not care to watch and do not attend regular season games. They undoubtedly know that their team will be playing come playoff time.

Decreasing the number of playoff teams creates a fairer system. The regular season gains more meaning, as teams must prove their superiority to receive a playoff berth. Then, playoff teams can rest assured that they will not be upset by an undeserving playoff team.

The second significant problem with the NHL is that there are now way too many teams. The fact that there are even teams in Columbus, Ohio, and Nashville, Tenn., is wrong. There is also no reason that the NHL needs two teams in warm-weather Florida, three teams in the New York-New Jersey area and a plethora of teams along the Pacific Coast in California.

The biggest burst of NHL expansion started in 1991 with the creation of the San Jose Sharks. Prior to the inception of the Sharks, the NHL had a perfect size of 21 teams (with the exception of the fact that 16 of the 21 teams still made the playoffs). These 21 teams were, for the most part, all in markets that could sustain a successful professional sports franchise.

The NHL's newest franchises are located in markets that are too small or do not have enough interest in hockey to foster the development of a successful franchise. Cities, such as Columbus, Ottawa, Miami and Tampa Bay, are not big enough "hockey towns" to house a professional team. These cities would be much better-suited to housing minor-league teams in the AHL or IHL.

Expansion sounds like a great idea, since it exposes more markets to the excitement of NHL hockey. Too often, expansion teams struggle after the original thrill of a professional franchise wears off.

This is exemplified by the Ottawa Senators, an expansion team in 1992. Ottawa is currently the best team in the NHL, yet filed for bankruptcy protection because the Ottawa market is proving unable to support an NHL franchise.

The best solution to the NHL's problems is to cut the number of teams in the league down to 22-24 and decrease the number of playoff teams significantly to eight. This will bring back tradition in the league by eliminating financially struggling teams in non-hockey markets. At the same time, limiting the number of playoff teams will bring fans back into the seats of the franchises in sustainable hockey markets.

The NHL offers a great product. Few sports are as fast paced and exhilarating as NHL hockey. Fans have been turned away from the game by the recent structure of the league. With these proposed changes, fans will be drawn back into the seats because the regular season will be more meaningful and more rivalries will develop after the elimination of struggling franchises.

Lady Bison lose two straight, fall to American and Lehigh

With the losses, Bucknell basketball's defending Patriot League Champions fall to 9-12 overall and 4-5 in league games

By Joe Schweitzer
Staff Writer

The Bucknell women's basketball squad suffered another difficult loss to American, 72-60, on Feb. 8. The Bison also lost a tough road contest to rival Lehigh, 68-61, Tuesday night. Both setbacks mark the finale of a grueling road trip for the defending Patriot League Champions as they fell to 9-12 overall and 4-5 in league games.

"Loss" seems to be the key theme from the game as the Bison were missing many of the things that brought them last year's championship. They were without the mental and physical toughness of co-captain Kate Franks '03, who missed her first game in 108 contests due to a hip injury. Also missing was the Orange and Blue's explosive offense as they struggled shooting the ball all afternoon. The most important aspect lacking on Saturday was their special ability to make that one big run that Bison fans expect from this squad.

Bucknell shot poorly to open the frame as they managed only seven points over the first eight minutes of play, falling behind 14-7. With the Bison trailing 18-11 near the halfway mark of the first period, Chelsea Smith '06 scored two big baskets and sparked an 8-2 run to pull Bucknell within one, 20-19. American caught fire from the field and built a 34-26 lead behind their Patriot League star, Chanel Hunt. The Orange and Blue charged back, cutting the deficit to six on several occasions, but poor officiating halted their efforts as several key starters were whistled for questionable calls. The Bison fought through the adversity and had a chance to head into the half down by only two, but an American steal and buzzer beater by Chanel Hunt sent Bucknell to the locker room trailing 40-32.

Desire Almind '04 continued her all-league play as she scored six points to ignite a 10-4 run that brought the Orange and Blue within four, 50-46, with 11 minutes, 41 seconds left. The Bison looked primed for one of their famous runs, but frustration set in as their cold shooting combined with refereeing difficulties. American continually knocked Bison players to the ground on almost every shot attempt, yet the whistles stayed silent as Bucknell missed nine straight shots and saw the Eagles expand their lead to 55-46. The Orange and Blue mounted a 9-4 run to draw within four with just under five minutes to play. More bad officiating combined with a 13-5 American run forced the aggravated Bison into continued poor shooting as they eventually fell 72-60. The squad shot a frigid 29 percent from the field for the second half.

"Every team goes into a game with a game plan on how to get the job done," Smith said. "The result of the game shows that American executed their game plan better than we did."

Molly Creamer '03 led the Bison with 26 points, but struggled from the field going 9-31 as she was the main recipient of the American cheap shots and lack of officiating. Almind scorched the Eagles with 18 points and 10 rebounds despite being in pain most of the contest with severe shin problems. Smith continued her strong play with seven points and 4 rebounds and Katie Hettler '04 played well, scoring five points and grabbing seven rebounds in her first career start in place of Franks. The Bison still missed Franks' presence out on the court.

"She gets overlooked because she may not always have the highest point total, but what she always does is rebound, play defense and all the intangibles that win games," fellow co-captain Creamer said. "We are definitely not as strong of a team without someone as good as Kate out there, but the young guys battled hard like always and stepped up. We're learning and trying to pick out the positives from these bumps we are taking."

The Bison headed to Lehigh Feb. 11, determined to pay the Mountain Hawks back for an earlier Bison loss, another learning bump that soured the opening of Sojka Pavilion. The Bison trailed from the very beginning and could not muster the energy to overcome a key second half Lehigh run as the Orange and Blue's road trip struggles continued with a 68-61 setback.

Lehigh started the game shooting the lights with an impressive 13-2 run that gave them a comfortable 18-8 lead. The Bison worked hard to claw their way back into the game and were finally ignited by five points from Katie Hettler '04 in a 26-second span. The teams exchanged punches for the next few minutes before the Bison caught fire. Guided by a relentless defense that forced 10 first half turnovers, the Orange and Blue mounted a 12-0 run to end the half on top 32-27. Bucknell played inspired basketball during the stretch with a mental focus that reminded fans of the good old days.

"In athletics, mental preparation is key," Smith said. "You have to see yourself playing hard and making shots. You have to know going into a game that you're going to get hit, bruised and knocked around, but ultimately be ready and rise to the challenge."

As was the case in previous games, the Bison just could not seem to play 40 minutes of basketball as fatigue and cold shooting again ruined their efforts. Lehigh's first possession of the second half was a three-pointer from Carli Tolliver and was a glimpse of things to come. The Bison responded to Tolliver's three by working their lead up to five, 43-37. Lehigh would not go quietly as they continued to hit key shots both from long range and with the shot clocking winding down and each basket took a little more energy away from the Orange and Blue.

Lehigh snatched the lead 49-44 with less than 15 minutes left and would never give it back. The Mountain Hawks continued their onslaught shooting 54 percent from downtown to charge an 8-0 run that gave them a 57-48 lead. Bucknell fought hard to get back into the game, but their shots were not falling and could not gather the strength to make key defensive stands en route to a disappointing 68-61 defeat.

Franks scored 14 of her game-high 17 points in the second half and Hettler continued her surging play with 9 points and 8 rebounds. Almind continued her inspiring play, registering 13 points and 11 rebounds despite aching shins and a sprained ankle.

Creamer, the nation's leading scorer, tallied 20 points without her usual quick burst due to tired legs.

"Molly is such a great competitor. She is a kid who cares so much that she takes every loss personally," Head Coach Kathy Fedorjaka said. "I don't know if it is so much that she is physically worn down as she is mentally. She has played a lot of minutes and we need some people to step up, carry the load and take some pressure off of her."

Catch the Bison in action Sunday as they welcome ESPN 2 to Sojka Pavilion for their 2 p.m. clash against Navy.

Sports Profile: Jamie Flick

By Josh Herwitt
Staff Writer

Eyes around the Patriot League at last week's Lehigh meet quickly turned to notice the up-and-coming swimming phenomenon, Jamie Flick '05. Her fast times in the breast stroke and individual medley have been an integral component in the team's success throughout the season, especially during the always-crucial Patriot League play.

With strong performances out of Flick and other teammates, the women's swimming team could be looking forward to a Patriot League title.

"The women's team has so much diversity and depth with a strong upper class, and a huge freshman class as well. If we keep performing like we've been, a Patriot League title is definitely in our midst," Flick said.

Flick and her teammates' performances in the relay events at the Lehigh meet last week played a critical role in the team's goal to capturing the Patriot League title.

"Relays are so important because they involve a team effort instead of just one individual. This weekend all of the relays were just completely psyched up and wanted to win so everything went perfectly," Flick said. "Fast starts are a key part to relays, and I think that was one important factor that gave us the edge this past weekend."

Flick's success at the Lehigh meet was no surprise to her. Her ambition and diligence created much of the success displayed at the Lehigh meet.

"She's got an incredible work ethic and she sets high goals for herself, which drive her every day in practice," Head Coach Jerry Foley said.

These goals that Foley speaks of were evident in Flick's recent success at the Lehigh meet.

"I always go into every meet with goal times that are usually faster than I normally swim in the regular season. I wasn't really expecting to see those times before the Patriot League Championships. Last year against Lehigh I had a terrible meet, because I let the pressure get to me, so this year I just wanted to prove to myself that I could stay focused and come out on top. Plus my whole family, lots of friends and even my high school coach came to the meet, so that made it even more special and motivating," Flick said.

With this new attention drawn upon Flick at the Lehigh meets, her team looks for her to progress and continue to her fast times, which would help bring them closer to the Patriot League title. Her coaches had expected Flick to dominate meets, but they were surprised at her new level of performance.

"She's the top rated breast stroker in the Patriot League, so we expected her to win every event. What was surprising was how fast she swam," Foley said.

Currently, the women's swimming team has been practicing hard in search of another Patriot League title. The coaching staff has continued to push its swimmers to challenge themselves and perform their best for the upcoming Patriot League Championships.

"Practice is going very well, we are beginning to reduce yardage so we can rest for Patriots. The coaches are as motivating as ever, coming up with great quotes and swimming articles to fire us up. The team is also very excited for patriots this year, and it shows through our practice habits. Everyone is working tremendously hard and encouraging one another constantly.

The coaches have done a good job putting us into groups, based on how much we need to rest, and the end result should be extremely rewarding and pleasing to every member of the team," Flick said.

With this positive attitude circulating throughout teammates and coaching staff, the Patriot League Championships could be very promising for many of the Bucknell women's swimmers. Look for superb performances from Flick and her teammates to propel the team to greatness.

"Cara made a huge contribution to our program last year as a freshman," Jamieson said. "His confidence level is now even higher having one year of college-level play under his belt."

Kelly Hogue '03 and Wes Fetchet '04 will also be on the attack. Hogue scored important goals down the stretch of games last year and Fetchet was sorely missed by the Bison after he went down with a knee injury. Fetchet was the Patriot League Rookie of the year two years ago.

Also greatly missed by the Bison last year was John Terracciano '03, who also went down with a knee injury in the Harvard game last season. Terracciano tallied a solid eight goals and eight assists in 2001 and was the major playmaker for the Bison.

"It's great to have Fetchet and Terracciano back," Sussman said. "They were sorely missed and it's going to help our transition game and finishing ability to have them out there."

As usual the Bison's schedule will be tough with six of their 13 opponents ranked in the preseason top-25. Patriot League foes Army (No. 20) and Hobart (25) join Maryland (5), North Carolina (9), Penn State (16) and Harvard on the Herd's challenging schedule. The Bison, who are currently ranked 24th in the preseason rankings,, are confident that they can stifle any national powerhouse.

A young defense could be the key factor in determining how far up in the rankings the Bison can move this year. Blaise Fletcher '04, Ned Hare '05 and Reece Pacheco will be the main players protecting Sussman.

"We've put a lot of the pieces of the puzzle together," Sussman said. "We've got a great defense that will help me out, giving me easy balls to save that will help our transition get going."

The University lacrosse program has come a long way since the early days of Jamieson's career. The team is looking to make this a year as memorable as the 1996 season. But if they're going to do it, they'll have to beat the best, which will start with next weekend's game against 9th-ranked North Carolina.

The Bison realize that they can't be the best without beating the best and that part of the reason they are now nationally recognized is because Jamieson prefers that his team plays the best of the best.

"It's always good to play the good guys," Jamieson said. "We're looking up at them right now and we're going to get after them. To be ranked 24th in the preseason is nice for recruiting and advertising the school, but we'll be disappointed if we're not higher than that at the end of the season."

After last week's decisive win over Lehigh and the completion of an undefeated dual meet season, the women's swimming and diving team is looking ahead to the Patriot League Championship meet to be held at home in Kinney Natatorium on February 20-22.

The women ended their season last year with losses only to Navy and American and a close finish at championships where the placed second, only 30 points behind Navy. Losing only two seniors to graduation and with the addition of a strong first-year class, this year's team has been highly successful. Not only have they gone undefeated for the first time in school history, but no other league team has even put up much of a fight. Now only a week out from the 2003 Patriot League Championship the Bison women are certainly the favorite for this year's title. A quick review of the team's strengths provides even greater insight into its past and upcoming success.

Senior co-captains Becky Dolan and Darby Golino lead the team. Dolan placed 11th in both the mile and 200 butterfly at last year's championship, and with added confidence and training should final in both these events along with the 500 free in this year's meet. Golino was one of the top contributors in last year's championship, placing 2nd in both the 100 and 200 backstrokes with a 5th place finish in the 200 IM. Going into the 2003 meet she is seeded 1st in all three of these events.

"I am very pleased with my seed times. I have been faster in season this year than ever before and more importantly the team is set up to finish strongly," Golino said. "I have complete confidence in us as individuals and as a team. There is no reason why we should not bring home a trophy this year."

The Class of 2004 is led by a group of freestylers in sprinter Meghan Freese, mid-distance swimmer Jen Cancro and distance specialist Daniela Faas. Freese was 1st in the 50 last year and 2nd in the 100 free. She won the 50 in a time of 24.10 last year, and already this season she has recorded 24.12 in the event. Cancro placed 3rd in the 200, 500 and 1,650 freestyles last year and should be a medal winner in these three events again at this year's meet. Faas placed 1st in the 1650, 2nd in the 500 and 3rd in the 400 IM in 2002. With the graduation of her top competition from Lehigh, Faas has the ability to garner 1st place finishes in all three of these events in the upcoming competition.

Jamie Flick, who placed 2nd in both the 100 and 200, leads the sophomores. She has nearly beaten her times from last year's meet already this season and the potential for her to be a champion in the breast strokes is very high. Jackie Feinthel looks to join Cancro and Faas in the freestyle events as she placed 5th in the mile and 8th in the 500 free last year. Her places hardly tell her ability, for her best times are competitive among the top three. This talent gives the Bison the possibility of sweeping the distance events at Championships.

Recruiting went well last year, and Head Coach Jerry Foley was able to bring in strong swimmers in the form of Lectie Altman and Mary Krakowski. Altman, a backstroke and freestyle specialist, has already posted times in her events, which would place her in the top 5 in all three events. Joining Golino in the backstroke and Cancro in the 200 free, the combination could seize multiple medal swims for the Bison. Coming out of her senior year in high school, Krakowski would have won last year's 100 butterfly. She is a strong addition, not only to the stroke group but to the medley relays as well. Krakowski helped secure a school record in the 200 medley relay when the Bison swam against Lehigh. Additional first-year support comes in the form of Vanessa Scaringi in the IM and Melissa Capparell in the breast stroke.

Overall, the women's team is in a position to dominate this year's competition.

"I have full confidence in the team's position. There is no reason that we can't win. The team has posted incredibly fast times already this year, and with the addition of our new complex and a great training trip, we have really put ourselves in a winning situation," Assistant Coach Kathleen O'Dell said. "I would like nothing more than to see the girls win this year at home."

Come out and support the Bison next Thursday as they work to seal their undefeated dual meet season with a final win at the Patriot League Championships.

Bison fall to American

"We gave them better looks than we would have liked at times," Hardenbergh said. "They hit some tough shots though at times and you have got to give it to them in that respect."

Bucknell hung in for most of the game, trailing 48-41 midway through the second half, thanks to first-year student Kevin Bettencourt's '06 career-best 20 points. The Bison were plagued by 21 careless turnovers throughout, and missed an open layup and three front-ends of 1-and-1s on four consecutive possessions, while trailing by the seven-point margin. American went on a 9-0 run later in the half, which proved to seal the deal.

Bettencourt was 7 of 14 from the floor and pulled down another career-high six rebounds. He talked about his career accomplishments.

"I was happier about the rebounding because that is something that I have been trying to get more involved in," Bettencourt said. "The coaches really have been working with me on getting more aggressive with boxing out and going to get the ball. I was just disappointed because we lost and it is hard to really enjoy those numbers."

Lalugba only attempted seven shots from the field, had 14 points and turned the ball over eight times. Lalugba reflected on both his miscues and those of the team.

"We turned the ball over too many times in the beginning of the game," Lalugba said. "It's tough playing good defense for 30 seconds and then coming down on the other end of the floor and turning it over after two passes. I take responsibility for a lot of the turnovers because I tried to force the issue too much. I didn't let the game come to me, and in result I turned the ball over eight times. I just have to learn from that game and be smarter with the ball."

Bucknell shot 60 percent from the foul line and allowed 70 points for the first time in 11 games. The team entered the contest ranked 7th nationally in points allowed per game. The Bison must bring their stellar defense back tonight against a Navy squad that scored 66 points on Bucknell their last meeting with each other in Annapolis. Bettencourt explained what the squad needs to do to be ready for the physical Midshipmen.

"I just think we have to continue to work hard, and I think that the more patient we are on offense and the better we take care of the ball will make playing defense easier," Bettencourt said. "Right now we are taking quick shots and turning the ball over so much that we end up playing defense for 30 out of the 40 minutes, and that is just wearing us down."

Hardenbergh said for the upcoming matchup with Navy the Bison will have to handle its rough style of play.

"I think we just have to match them physically by being strong with the ball and boxing out," Hardenbergh said. "They are the type of team that uses offensive rebounds to provide their offense at times. We have got to help inside on their big men because they have some pretty strong kids."

Bucknell will host Navy tonight at 9 p.m., a game that will be televised on Patriot League television.

Tennis drops four straight

The Bison men's tennis team dropped its first four spring season matches last weekend at the Cornell Duals, but the focus was the valuable experience gained. The women's tennis team has been practicing daily in preparation for upcoming matches.

The men's team struggled in its first bout against Cornell, winning none of the six matches that they played. The second matches against Niagra did allow for one winner as Don Whaley '06 and Aaron Superstein '06 teamed up to win the doubles event.

The team's most successful matches of the weekend came against Buffalo, in which Asher Salaam '06 and Joe Menezes '05 won the three and four spots, respectively.

Although as a team the Bison did not win any of the four matches that weekend, they remain positive about the overall outcome.

"I feel that the weekend went well and we faced four very good teams. We got a lot of match experience which will pay off when we start our Patriot League matches," Assistant Coach Sean Monaghan said.

The men's squad has a one-month hiatus from competition before it travels to Hilton, S.C., to take on Rhodes College over spring break. The Bison hope to use that time to improve their play.

"The men will be focusing on skill work, match play drills, sport-specific conditioning drills to help with their movement," Monaghan said. "In addition, they will be using a lot of live ball drilling that focus on match play situations in which we can focus on strategy."

The women's team had originally been scheduled to play this coming weekend at St. Francis, but the matches have been canceled due to court unavailability. The team has been practicing daily, including a rigorous weight room training regiment that the Bison hope will help them in their upcoming match against St. Bonaventure.

The Bison, who were 9-9 overall last year and 1-4 in the Patriot League, have been picked to finish 4th in the league, a prediction that may have been influenced by some recent team injuries sustained. Three of the top six women have been unable to practice in the preseason and will likely miss some matches.

"Our team does have good depth," Head Coach Rebecca Helt said. "But when three players are hurt it changes the whole picture. Our team has been very good about responding. We haven't complained and have continued to work hard. Hopefully we will be a full team by spring break."

Captain Samantha Berthod '04, a three-year letter winner, will lead the team this year. Also contributing against St. Bonaventure will be Veronica Brown '06, Tonya Sichko '05 and Chelsea Mills '06.

"We expect to go into our first matches and play strong and we expect to win," Helt said. "We want to start our season off with a bang."

seed times in the 200-meter dash with times of 21.80 and 22.00 seconds, respectively. Then Newberger and Brian Klotz '03 ran under 50 in the 400. Not to be outdone, Eric Furst '03 (4:11) keyed off of teammate Lou Palma '03 (4:12) in the mile, as both hit the IC4A qualifying mark.

The men's 5K saw five personal bests, with Dan Lounsbury '05 leading the way with a personal best (:48) by way of a 4:46 last mile. In the 3K, Bryan Johnston, who was recently named Patriot League Scholar Athlete of the year for the 2002 cross country season, continued a fine season with a relaxed win, just shy of his best time.

Away from the track, the men had mixed results. The jumpers and vaulters were solid, led by Jeff Arek '03, who vaulted 14-11 on his first attempt and had some close calls at 15-05. Powell did well in the long jump and triple jumper Mike Mellas '04 had a 2-foot best.

The throwers had a rough day. Making the day even tougher was seeing national class athlete Kevin Toth throw a monstrous 69 feet in the shot put.

The Lady Bison were led by Charity Brady '03, with her ECAC qualifying 400 run. Nicki Piper '03 barely missed the ECAC mark by herself in the 800 and with teammates Amy Calvo '05, Monique Boley '05 and Brady in the 4x400 relay, but feels confident that the times will come. Kiley MacDonald '05 broke 26 in the 200, just ahead of teammate, Rehana Lanewala '05, who is recovering from illness.

Other notable women on the track included Jen Marsh '05 in the mile and Calvo in the 400. In the throwing circle, Angie McFarland led the women in the weight throw and in the shot, with a put of 41 feet.

The fast times and big marks will allow some to take a break before leagues, while others will be hoping to build on the momentum.

"Now that I know what I'm capable of running, I feel as though I should push myself even farther. We still have Patriot Leagues in a couple weeks, so I want to make sure that I continue to run hard," Charity Brady '03 said after her 400 ECAC qualifying run.

Bucknell hosts its last home indoor meet of the season with the Bucknell Winter Classic tomorrow.

"It's my last indoor home meet, so I'd like to run well here at the Fieldhouse one more time," Brady said.

Head Coach Kevin Donner is realistic about the team's chances this weekend.

"I call this weekend playing defense," Donner said. "Most of our athletes will not be running numerous events. We will try to fine-tune our team to prepare for Patriot League.

Some of our top people may not even compete. A few need to improve on a seed time to get into the fast heats at leagues. Overall, I just want to come out of the meet on Saturday healthy."

Over the last two seasons, the superb performances displayed by track star Amy Calvo '05 have people quickly noticing her as one of the most dominate women sprinters in the Patriot League. The mark that she has made in less than two seasons is quite remarkable.

Growing up in Lawrenceville, N.J., directly between Princeton and Trenton, Calvo began running track in middle school. From there, she ran the 400-meter dash and the 4x400 relay races for four years in high school, breaking every school record and receiving MVP each year.

Currently, Calvo participates in the 500, the 4x400 relay and the 400, as well as her newest event, the 800. She recently was named Patriot League Runners of the Week and Bull Run Inn Bison Athlete of the Week after capturing 1st place in the 500 with a school record-breaking time of 1 minute, 15.01 seconds. Along with her record in the 500, Calvo helped her team in the 4x400 with a 4th place finish and a time of 3:53.99.

Although her accomplishments are more noticeable in the 500, Calvo prefers competing alongside her teammates.

"I like the 4x400 relay because it is more exciting and the rest of the team normally gets pumped about it as well. It's a great feeling to come around the turn and have a mass of people cheering me and the relay on. I also feel very confident in the girls who are on the team. They always run well. We are also very close so it feels so good when we do well together," Calvo said.

The outstanding achievements that Calvo has already demonstrated have been largely due to her diligence, dedication and high self-expectations. Her impact upon a race is compelling.

"Amy has had a tremendous season thus far. She is the sparkplug on our team. Whenever Amy lines up to run a race, it seems like everyone stops what they are doing to watch her race. That's when a coach knows when an athlete has reached a new level. Amy had an outstanding freshmen year last year and it is great to see that she is still improving at a great level," Head Coach Kevin Donner said.

Although Calvo's recent successes have brought her praise and admiration, there are still the high expectations from her coaches, teammates and fans that she must try to live up to.

"It is always more relaxing when no one has any expectations. Now it's not a nice surprise when I run well—I am supposed to run well. The recognition has felt wonderful but it adds pressure because now people have an expectation of a certain level of competition. I just hope I can live up to those expectations."

Calvo also gives much credit for her success to her fellow teammates and their encouragement and support.

"The three girls I run with have had a particular influence on me because they just make practice so much more enjoyable and they are so encouraging. There are always days where one of us is tired and wants to slack, but the other three are always there to make sure we keep going. They are great to have as training partners and just increase the level of practice so much more," Calvo said. "The team has also been a great influence on me, especially last year getting to see the success of the older girls on the team. It gave me people I wanted to emulate like Stef Bango and Tanya McSwain. The team as a whole is made up of great people to be around. It is motivating to be around them because everyone is working to achieve the same goal."

With two more years left at the University, many are looking toward Calvo for more great things to come for the track team.

New York poet slams crowd of 250

A crowd of about 250 students and Lewisburg community members filed into the 7th Street Café, packing the venue wall to wall, anticipating the third installment in the Bucknell Poetry Slam Series. Headlining the event was New York slam poet Kamal Symonette-Dixon, 3rd-place finisher at the 2002 National Poetry Slam, an accomplished actor and poet.

Following a brief open microphone, Symonette-Dixon set the pace for the rest of the evening, infusing the crowd with energy. Offering poems ranging from mock-love poems to a Sept. 11 remembrance piece, Symonette-Dixon enthralled the crowd, showing the University just how far slam can take a poet and poetry.

"It's not the boring, methodical stuff that was always forced down my throat in high school," Charissa Reimer '05 said.

Keeping the slam rolling, the University's slam celebrity, Aaron DeRosa '03, hosted the event. The student competition featured 11 student poets, divided into three groups and three individuals. Rebecca Wadlinger '06, Chad North '06 and Mary Pancoast '06 forming the group "Funk Masta Becca and Dawgs," performed the highest scoring poem of the night, "I was slammed by Aaron DeRosa." With a score of 29.6, it beat sophomore Phil Martoma's poem, "This is a Poem About Jesus" by only 1.3 points.

Martoma's team, "My Relationship with Your Mom," comprised of Martoma, Joe Trullinger '03 and Josh Fisher '04, won in the end, beating out "Becca and the Dawgs" by 0.2 points, the closest margin in Bucknell Slam history. The prize for the evening was a Scorpion Dirt Devil. Added to the prize was the Slam hammer, or "The Slammer," a new addition to the Bucknell Poetry Slam Series tradition. "The Slammer" will be marked with the names of the new winners and boasts the names of previous slam winners.

Slam poetry is best described as competitive performance poetry. It is essentially a contest in which participants partake in three rounds, performing their own work, which is scored by a group of judges randomly selected from the crowd. The judges award each poem an individual score, and then the scores are added together, with the lowest and highest being thrown out, to produce the final total for a round. Scoring ranges from a 0-10, 10 being the best score possible.

Although this event is essentially a competition, it is more a unique chance for poets to express themselves and their work to an attentive audience of their peers.

"Slam poetry is important at Bucknell for the same reason that all of our literary magazines are so vital to the campus—students need a place to voice themselves," Kristin Robbins '03 said. "Bucknell can be a stifling environment, and then you find yourself in front of a crowd of people cheering on your poetry, and more importantly, what you have to say."

The poets were very passionate about their poems and the ideas they expressed through them. It obviously excited them to have this rare opportunity to use their creativity to articulate issues of importance to them.

"It is exciting for me to see someone ... get up there, let go of their inhibitions and give it all they've got," Christina Macmillan '05 said. "Slamming a poem gives you a sense of freedom and strength that, as a poet, can be hard to find anywhere else."

"I always enjoyed attending [slams], and now I'm hooked on it since my first slam participation last semester. I love having the opportunity to compete. Aaron always finds wonderful feature poets and Bucknell offers some stunning writers as well," participating poet Emily Izbicki '05 said. "Slams are the best thing since that blue hat."

"BarberShop" is not your typical "Friday" movie

By Dave Merin
Writer

Ice Cube in an urban comedy sounds like one of those "Friday" movies. I mean after "Friday," "Next Friday," and "Friday After Next." What else would I expect out of the rapper-turned-actor?

"BarberShop" opens with the incompetent robbery of an ATM machine from a convenience store in the middle of the night, a scene that could be stripped from one of Ice Cube's earlier movies. Cut to the next morning, when Calvin (Ice Cube) is opening his barbershop across the street.

Calvin inherited the shop from his father two years also. It has been in his family and a part of the community for 40 years. Calvin has been having financial troubles since he blew all his money, including loans against the barbershop, on get rich quick schemes. Rather than saving the barbershop, Calvin passes his days thinking about how to spend his money once he strikes gold.

Calvin's first visit of the day is from a banker who says that the bank is going to foreclose on the barbershop, unless Calvin turns it around. After considering his options, Calvin decides to take up a local loan shark on his offer to buy the barbershop and turn it into a strip club.

The movie shows the hilarious antics of the employees and patrons of the barbershop and the local community. By the end of the day, Calvin realizes all that he has taken for granted and wishes that he had never agreed to sell the shop.

What really separates "BarberShop" from most other comedies is that it conveys a meaning that is more than just another punch line. The movie shows the difference between today's "no-work-ethic, get-rich-quick" youth and yesterday's hard working youth.

Whether you're in the mood for just another comedy or a solid movie with a real message, there's something for everyone in "BarberShop."

String quartet celebrates 25th anniversary with University

By Julianna Pietak
Senior Writer

Twenty-five years ago, a group of talented musicians performed its first concert at the University. This same group, the Fitzwilliam String Quartet, celebrated their anniversary Sunday night with a concert that was as exceptional as it was commemorative.

In 1978, Professor of Music Barry Hannigan had just arrived on campus after his education at the Eastman School of Music. He was not the only musician to arrive on campus that September. The Fitzwilliam String Quartet was also to make its University debut that month. The string quartet, made up of two violins, a viola and a violoncello, needed a pianist and asked Hannigan to perform in this first concert.

"Having them to play with was wonderful. They were high quality musicians and they were willing to play with a new professor—they were not only willing to play with me, but they wanted to play with me. This was wonderful," Barry Hannigan said. "[It was] the most memorable experience I've had with them—a first recital sets your reputation and your mood as a musician."

Concert Review

The anniversary of this collaboration was celebrated with the performance of the Piano Quintet in F minor, Op. 34, by Johannes Brahms. Hannigan joined the members of the Fitzwilliam String Quartet: Lucy Russell, Jonathan Sparey, Alan George and Nicola Baxter. The first movement of what Hannigan called a "fabulous" piece began mellow, then built in drama.

There was a blend of all five of the instruments performing, building and moving as a single unit. Despite the constant sense of motion and progress, this movement retained an air of beauty, not harshness, even during the more dramatic sections.

Andante, un poco Adagio, the second movement, began with warm chords in the piano. The piano and strings then played off each other, often performing quite different parts, in a beautiful and lyrical combination.

The third movement of this Brahms quintet, Scherzo: Allegro, was perhaps the most powerful. It set the mood in the beginning with a string of steady beats in the cello and the piano. This movement was amazingly powerful, dynamic and dramatic. Even the slower sections had an inner tension of motion and energy. Ending this piece was the final movement, Poco sostenuto Allegro non troppo. This segment began with slow, lyrical strains in all of the instruments playing, building and echoing off of each other. The whole piece personified the beauty of Romantic power and energy.

This energy stood out to music major Colin Aherne '05.

"They played with such vitality. You couldn't help but listen," Aherne said.

The program began with a Trio in D major, Op.25, for flute, violin and viola, by Franz Joseph Haydn and Beethoven's Serenade in D major, Op. 25, for flute, violin and viola. Both featured Professor of Music Mary Hannigan on flute. This combination of instruments utilized the unique blend of the cool, sweet sound of the flute with the warm, lyrical timbre of strings.

The Haydn piece highlighted the flute with the melody at the beginning while the quartet provided accompanying support. As the piece continued, these two increased in balance, and the piece grew in harmonic complexity.

This increasingly complicated sound was also a characteristic of Beethoven's Serenade. As the movements continued, they became more intricate in harmony and form. By the last of the six movements, there were three identifiable style changes.

This high quality repertoire is characteristic of the Fitzwilliam String Quartet. It has even achieved renown "The Shostakovich Quartet," due to its close personal association with the famous composer. It has achieved this prominence despite several personnel changes. Hannigan lists these changes as the biggest in their group dynamic.

"Personnel makes all the difference in the world, even with one new member it is a different air with a different mix. It has really been four different quartets based on different people," Hannigan said. "However, this is not to say that any have been better or worse, everyone just has something different to add to the mix."

Regardless, the fact that the group has remained in existence for 25 years is remarkable to Hannigan.

"There aren't many string quartets that play together for this long," Hannigan said.

Two of the quartet members, Jonathan Sparey and Alan George, have been playing with the group continuously since their first performance at the University. A quarter century later, this most recent residency featured two additional concerts, as well as lecture demonstrations and teaching for existing music classes on campus. The Fitzwilliam String Quartet continues to visit the University year after year for many reasons.

"They have friends here, they love the students here, they just truly love Bucknell," Hannigan said.

"Phrenology" elevates The Roots

By Chad Flood
Senior Writer

Far too many rap acts today are little more than pop bands in Fubu clothing. Between the bubblegum beats of Nelly and the short-lived craze of whomever P. Diddy is promoting that week, it seems that lasting hip-hop artists like Run-DMC and Dr. Dre are of the past. There is little difference between most mainstream rappers, disappointing when considering the genre's cultural and controversial history.

Six guys from Philadelphia aim to change the current direction of hip-hop. The Roots broke out of their underground status with 1999's acclaimed album "Things Fall Apart," for which the song "You Got Me" won both a Grammy and a move into popular culture.

In addition to writing thought-provoking lyrics, the Roots also play their own instruments, backed Jay-Z at his recent MTV Unplugged performance and even opened for the Dave Matthews Band. It was only a matter of time before they started to experiment more with their unique sound.

The first musical track, "Rock You," from their latest album ("Phrenology"), intends to do just that, with a solid rock influence. In addition, the album's most intriguing track, "The Seed," sees The Roots completely break away from the traditional rap beat in exchange for a more indie-rock sound.

CD Review

The album is still full of heavy hitting hip-hop sounds. The dance tune "Water" maintains a steady beat, eventually giving way to a jazzy jam band feel, and the R&B styled "Pussy Galore" makes most current rap ballads sound weak.

The Roots' biggest draw, it seems, is in their desire to experiment and stay away from any single musical category. They have had experience working with a wide range of artists, include Erykah Badu, Nelly Furtado and Musiq.

They are among the few groups to have associations outside of the hip-hop community without forgetting where they came from.

Philadelphia has certainly played a role in the stardom of many individuals, including Will Smith, Elton John and Kobe Bryant. In The Roots, the city can be proud of a positive, talented rap group that stays true to its namesake.

"The Vagina Monologues" return

V-Day-sponsored play dedicated to ending violence against women, procedes go to SVWIT

By Kristen Habacht
Staff Writer

An incredible opportunity—the power to support the V-Day movement, which promotes a world without violence, and the chance to enjoy a world-famous theatrical production—is available on campus this weekend.

The third annual production of Eve Ensler's "The Vagina Monolgues," directed by Lee Cromwell '05 and Ibby Cizmar '03, will be performed by a cast of female students and faculty members. Some men will perform in the newly added male monologues, giving men a voice to speak out against violence as well.

"I think this has to be one of the best things this campus does in terms of awareness and unity among women," Liisa Britt '04 said.

Many people are confused by "The Vagina Monologues" and the V-Day movement. To some it is a mystery, others know some facts but not all and some oppose the production regardless of its purpose. After Ensler had performed her play in many locations, she created V-day in 1998 in response to hearing about many incidents of rape, incest, domestic battery and genital mutilation. The concept behind V-Day is to increase awareness of women's struggles in a society where they are often silenced, and to raise money for anti-violence organizations. The Bucknell V-Day campaign will be supporting the Susquehanna Valley Women in Transition (SVWIT) organization.

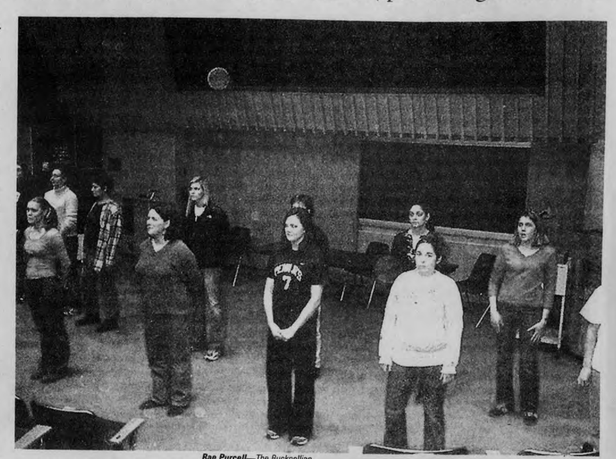
"For a lot of reasons I think this is an important play and movement. I think Eve Ensler is right that we have to imagine a world without violence to women in order to make it a reality and that is what this play does," said Associate Professor of English Jean Peterson, one of the participating faculty members.

"The Vagina Monologues" can be daunting for many people. The name turns many prospective viewers away and the blunt nature of the play can be unappealing to others. It is also an experience that unites many people and the feelings, concepts and stories stay with the viewer long after the curtain falls.

"This is such an important production because it is so multifaceted—it's entertaining, educational, liberating and it touches every emotion," Meredith Field '04 said.

The production is controversial and many people have voiced their disapproval of the production, but it is truly something you should see before you judge.

"I feel that being a director of this show is an incredible opportunity for me as a person. I feel so privileged to work with these talented people about a play and ideas that mean so much to me and are so applicable to everyone," Cromwell said. "My hope for those who come to the show is that, regardless on how they feel about the play, they take away an appreciation and an awareness of the power of Eve's words and what she is saying."



Rae Purcell—The Bucknellian

Top: Students rehearse their monologues for this weekend's shows. Bottom: Director Lee Cromwell '05 oversees final rehearsals. "The Vagina Monologues" will be performed tonight at 5 p.m. and Saturday at 8 p.m.

A new addition to the production this year is monologues performed by men. Though these monologues are not found in the initial production of the play, and none are written by Ensler, many of the men are excited to participate.

"I feel excited to be a part of this event, which I feel is a cause worth working for," Phil Martoma '05 said.

Proceeds will be given to SVWIT. Shows will be performed tonight at 5 p.m. and tomorrow at 8 p.m. in the Harvey Powers Theatre in Coleman Hall. Ruth Kocher kicks off Drew Darrow Memorial Series

By Beth Kengeter
Writer

Ruth Ellen Kocher gave the inaugural reading for the Drew Darrow Memorial Reading Series last Sunday. The event, at which Kocher read selected poems from her two books, "Desdemona's Fire" and "When the Moon Knows You're Wandering," as well as her soon-to-be-published book "One Girl Babylon," was very well attended.

The poems Kocher read were largely autobiographical, ranging from her love-hate relationship with her native state in "Plea for Pennsylvania," to "Ode for the Woman who on the Day I Earned my Doctorate Mistook me as a Sales Clerk."

Audience members felt the poetry reading was a success.

"I thought it was beautiful," Anjuli White '04 said. "I think my favorite poem was 'Susan's Hair.' It was very interesting how Kocher described her own hair and then searched for a connection with the other girl even though she [the girl] was Caucasian."

Students in the audience related to Kocher's poems about college life.

"My favorite was the one about the red shoes," said Kate Tanita '06, referring to a poem that discusses that one article of clothing every college student owns and her or his friends covet.

Kocher is no stranger to success. Her first book, "Desdemona's Fire," received the Naomi Long Madgett Award and the Green Rose Prize was awarded for her second book, "When the Moon Knows You're Wandering."

Her work has appeared in many journals, including "Ploughshares," "Crab Orchard Review" and "Gettysburg Review," and has been anthologized in "New Sister Voices and New Bones: Contemporary Black Writers in America."

A native of Wilkes-Barre and graduate of Penn State University, Kocher received her M.F.A. and Ph.D. from Arizona State University.

She currently teaches creative writing and African-American literature at the University of Missouri in St. Louis. Kochur offered advice to aspiring poets.

"Read twice as many poems as you write. My biggest surprise is that student poets don't read much poetry," Kochur said.

Kocher was also a former fellow in the Bucknell Seminar for Younger Poets, a program that provides an extended opportunity for undergraduate poets to be guided by established poets and writers.

The poetry reading was the first of the Drew Darrow Memorial Reading Series, honoring the memory of Andrew Darrow '86, who passed away in 1997.

Darrow, a computer science major, was an employee of the University's Writing Center. After graduating from the University, he worked as an actor in New York City.

"The event was lovely, really a perfect beginning to a great new tradition," said John Rickard, associate professor of English and department chair.

Excerpt from
"At Home the People Sing"
By Ruth Kocher

This is where the people sing, far from me,
where winters seem coldest
and the deep call of wilderness screams through trees into the sore landscape of quarry cliffs, where woods turn suddenly into a city of narrow roads
and the old wander through town searching for a doorway to remind them their lives are not a pain they dream to remind them they are alive.
These lives are where they sing.

"Read twice as many poems as you write. My biggest surprise is that student poets don't read much poetry."

Love is in the air...

Saint Story

During the rule of Roman Emperor Claudius II, his army was engaged in many battles. The army needed more men, yet they were reluctant to enlist. Claudius felt that married men were less likely to sign up for the army because of their family commitments, and he banned anyone from becoming married or engaged. Valentine, a Roman priest during the reign of Claudius, objected to the ban, and he continued to secretly marry couples. Valentine was caught and sentenced to death. While in jail, he fell in love with a you woman who visited him, and on Feb. 14, he penned her a letter which he signed, "From Your Valentine."

Pope Gelasius I selected Feb. 14 as St. Valentine's Day in 496 A.D.

Cupid Story

Feb. 14 was the feast day of Juno, queen of the ancient Roman gods and goddesses, as well as goddess of women and marriage. This feast was followed by Lupercalia on Feb. 15. During Lupercalia, boys and girls—typically kept separate—were brought together. Young girls wrote their names on slips of paper and placed them in a jar, and the boys then selected a slip. The two would be partners for a period of time ranging from the duration of the feast to a year. At times, the two would even fall in love and get married. Other symbols of Valentine's Day emerge from ancient Rome, such as the figures of Venus, goddess of love, and her son Cupid, whose arrows can cause humans to fall in love.

Valentines replace parking tickets in Lewisburg during February

By Leah Cunningham
A&E Editor

Only 30 seconds too late for Lewisburg's downtown meter, a ticket is about to ruin someone's day. Instead, a pink piece of paper confronts the downtown shopper. It reads: "Lewisburg Loves You! We don't want your day to be ruined by this ticket! Lewisburg Business and Professional Association [LBPA] has therefore offered to pay your fine. Enjoy the rest of your day in town."

Unique to Lewisburg, this valentine is one reason to appreciate the small town and what it has to offer. "Valentine" happens to be the last name of downtown Lewisburg's meter supervisor. This year, the long-standing tradition of being issued a valentine instead of a parking ticket may just fall upon your lucky day. In the efforts to encourage the annual "Lewisburg Loves You" theme, Lewisburg's Downtown Partnership (LDP) is working in conjunction with the LBPA to make parking a more festive experience in honor of Valentine's Day.

The LBPA has offered to pay the parking tickets distributed in February for only those individuals who encounter the parking meter supervisor, Leslie Valentine, in the process of issuing a ticket.

"For this month, we will be paying just for those tickets which are being written while a person is returning to their car. Instead of a ticket, the meter supervisor will give a smile and a valentine," LBPA President Linda Sterling said.

Valentine explained that although it would be convenient at times, she does not have the authority to forgive a parking ticket once she starts writing one. She said that many times she would already start to issue a ticket as people came running across the street to their cars.

> "I think it's a great idea to give a Valentine instead because it's more fun and a change of pace. People are often pleasantly surprised."
> —Leslie Valentine, parking meter supervisor

"The people who see me at their cars before I start writing a ticket are the lucky ones," Valentine said. "I think it's a great idea to give a valentine instead because it's more fun and a change of pace. People are often pleasantly surprised."

In promoting the Lewisburg Loves You program, the LBPA has paid the parking tickets of between 30 and 40 people for the past three years. While Sterling believes that some people think Lewisburg has unfriendly ordinances, as previously revealed in a survey of Lewisburg residents, she also sees this Valentine's Day initiative as a new and cheerful way to promote positive downtown relations.

"Every day is a little different," Valentine said. "I always meet new people. The other day I was happy to issue valentines to two people I knew who worked in town."

While University students may be on the lookout for valentines instead of tickets, Valentine recalls that within three years of holding her position, she has issued very few "Lewisburg Loves You" tickets to students.

"I gave out four valentines last Tuesday," Valentine said. "I think one woman worked at Bucknell because she had the decal on her car."

One student admitted to receiving a surprise valentine "ticket."

"My brother came to visit me the other week, and he parked outside CVS while we went to lunch and walked around," Robin Griffith '06 said. "Next thing we know, we see a woman about to write a ticket. He [my brother] made it just in time to receive a little pink valentine. I thought it was a nice gesture."

The normal parking ticket costs $3 if paid within 48 hours and $10 if paid after that time.

"It's just that people get annoyed with having to pay a ticket, so people are usually cheerful and very appreciative when they get a valentine instead," Valentine said.

Local television stations have noticed Lewisburg's valentine trend, and the tradition has even received publicity from USA Today and The Harrisburg Daily Patriot.

"The goal is publicity," Sterling said. "It presents Lewisburg in a light which appreciates its customers. I hope we continue doing this every year."

There are two more weeks left in February, and Valentine is anxious to give out a little Valentine's Day cheer. Valentine encourages people to shop downtown, yet cautions people from "running away" from her, their car or the meter ticket. After all, a quaint and unexpected valentine never hurt anyone.

Bucknell Brigade brings aid to Nicaragua

By Jolene Hart
Senior Editor

Until about a month ago, the term "culture shock" was one that I had heard plenty about, yet never fully understood. Before spending a year abroad in Europe, I had been advised by family, friends and professors that I should prepare for anxiety that would come naturally from spending time in a new environment. Somehow I just didn't feel it.

Although my worldview was broadened significantly during those months abroad, I could hardly consider myself "shocked" by a continent that boasts technology, economy and development much like our own. It wasn't until I had the opportunity to travel to Nicaragua as a member of the Bucknell Brigade that I felt what it truly meant to be overwhelmed by another culture and stunned by its means of existence.

My first hint of the rarity of the Brigade experience came as our plane touched down in Managua, Nicaragua and I thought for an instant, "Maybe this isn't such a great idea," realizing that the next week of my life was going to push my physical and emotional limits.

Twenty-five other student and staff volunteers from the University were seated around me on that plane, each with unique backgrounds and perhaps even different reasons for joining the Bucknell Brigade, though all possessing the same compassion, social conscience, open-mindedness and energy that seems to characterize all who involve themselves in the mission.

A delegation of Bucknellians has traveled to Nicaragua on a humanitarian aid mission twice each year since 1998, when Hurricane Mitch devastated the country. It was then that Nicaragua became the poorest country in all of Latin America.

What was impressed upon us in the weeks before our departure was the fact that the desperation in Nicaragua was not caused by a single natural disaster; rather, it had been developing for decades and Hurricane Mitch was its culmination.

In short, we knew that the foreign involvement of our own country had in some way contributed to the conditions we were about to experience.

Each brigade has aided the people of Nicaragua, specifically the town of Nueva Vida, in its own distinct way, working to build shelter and a health clinic and to provide medical supplies to a community in desperate need. The January 2003 brigade departed with the goal of continuing the construction of a women's health care facility, though we came away with so much more.

Although we arrived after dark at Jubilee House Community (JHC), an American non-profit organization with international mission status in Nicaragua that served as our hosts, we could still sense the intensity of Nicaragua's tropical climate in the humid air that made the dust from the dirt roads stick to our skin.

Our lodging would be a volunteer dorm, not yet completed, which we shared with a quantity of spiders, scorpions and geckos that passed freely through the yet-unscreened windows and doors. Sleeping that first night wasn't easy, in spite of our fatigue and the fact that we would begin intense work the next day.

After awakening to a racket of barking dogs, chattering birds and a rooster, we tried our first (of many) servings of rice and beans and traveled to the town of Nueva Vida, the core of our mission.

The distance to the town was minimal, though made arduous by the giant craters and obstacles that dotted the dusty road. Herds of cattle and oxen pulling carts passed around us as our driver skillfully maneuvered the small bus. On either side we could look out onto mounds of trash that crowded the road. From my seat, I watched the children and animals passing among it and felt an overwhelming sense of helplessness. The air was thick with smoke from the fires that had been set to burn away some of the garbage; small piles of ash smoldered every few yards.

I thought I had imagined what extreme poverty would look like, but the truth is that I had no idea. I think that only experience can convey the power of such a realization. The staggering immediacy of the Nicaraguan need was enough to make me nauseous and guilt-stricken at my own way of life. It was difficult to internalize that these conditions exist at the same time as our own society, and the knowledge that we could easily pick up and return home was suddenly more of a burden than a comfort.

A girl waits to see the doctor at the Nueva Vida Health Clinic in Nicuragua. Students on the January Brigade helped the doctors and nurses in the health clinic and helped construct an additional buiding.

Nueva Vida's health clinic, built by former delegations of the Bucknell Brigade, was an inspiration in and of itself. Seeing exactly what was accomplished by people much like ourselves was a powerful reminder of our own potential at a time when we were astounded by the conditions around us. It was never more evident exactly what our hours of fundraising and campaigning were working to achieve.

We spent the next few days working toward the completion of the women's clinic and JHC's volunteer dorm. It didn't take long for dust and dirt to find its way onto all of our clothes, towels, beds and bodies, though we seemed to notice less and less as the week went on. The feeling of collapsing—filthy, sore and exhausted—was infinitely more satisfying than that of a hot shower. Small groups worked steadily at their tasks to reach the larger goal of pouring a concrete roof on the dorm, a process that truly required hard labor.

Before the concrete could be poured, the roof was secured with rebar, piles of stone and cement were transported, cement was mixed by hand and was hoisted up to the roof via a pulley system. After finally completing the project, despite having suffered our share of trials, no one could talk of anything but the amazing feelings of solidarity and satisfaction that we experienced. Many of us conceded that during those days we worked harder than we had ever worked in our lives, and it was clear that the support we provided each other gave us a means of accomplishing what we had once thought impossible.

In trips taken around Managua, the Nicaraguan capital, we had the opportunity to see further aspects of Nicaraguan culture. Reflections of the political history of Nicaragua manifested themselves everywhere, from the Martyrs Monument, which overlooks a cliff that served as the resting place for many of the opponents of the Somoza dictatorship, to the more subtle silhouette of Augusto Sandino that crested a hillside. We experienced the natural beauty of the country in the active Masaya Volcano and the Laguna de Apoyo, a tropical paradise tucked away in a volcano's crater.

An unforgettable day came as we trekked to a coffee co-op, El Porvenir, in the northern mountains. The five-hour trip took us from a highway to a one-lane dirt road and finally found us riding to the top of the mountain in a tractor-pulled cart. Along the way we picked up several children who were walking to the top, children who lived in the tiny thatch huts tucked alongside the path.

The trip, though laborious, was worth our effort in the aid we were able to offer 152 people who live without water, electric power or medical care and in the economic support that we extended to a community that survives off the land. The quantity of coffee produced at El Porvenir is not large enough to warrant involvement of organizations like Fair Trade, leaving the people with little opportunity to receive any profit in the world market. The people of the community graciously offered us a look at their co-op's operation and much of the land, surrounded by jungle and rocky mountain ranges, that gives them a means of existence.

My most profound experiences in Nicaragua came in the moments that I was able to communicate with the people, whether through words, a smile or a game of soccer with children. I found, more than anything, that the eyes of the Nicaraguan people I met sparkled with intensity and vitality, windows to the passion and pride that they take in their lives.

During the week, I assisted in Nueva Vida's clinic, helping to dispense prescriptions and translating for many of the patients. All patients conveyed their gratitude in the visible comfort and joy that glowed within them in receiving the caring touch of another. A simple container of children's vitamins was enough to elicit tears in the eyes of a young mother who cried out for support.

When our group brought bubbles, temporary tattoos and a Polaroid camera on our last day in Nueva Vida, it was difficult to say who received a greater thrill from the experience. I watched as the people that I had seen in my classes and around campus reflected the pure joy of making someone else happy through the smallest of gestures. When we look back now, this is what we remember and, in reality, this is why we went.

Although we as individuals are unable to reconcile the past, the ongoing mission of the Bucknell Brigade speaks to our desire to affect change in the future. I cannot stress enough how grateful I am for having had this experience, for seeing the life of a country that has never had the advantages that we enjoy and also for meeting people from my own home who make me confident in the undying compassion of humanity. It feels as if our world would be a very different place if everyone had the opportunity to share in this experience only once in their lives.

The January 2003 Bucknell Brigade received so much from our week in Nicaragua, seemingly more than we were even able to provide. On our small campus, it is likely that each of us knows someone involved with the Brigade who can tell, in their own words, what it means to participate. I guarantee that they would be anxious to tell. We can only say that if an opportunity like the Bucknell Brigade presents itself—become involved, because in changing the lives of others you inevitably change yourself.

Brigade members comment on experiences in Nicaragua

"One of my favorite memories was getting hands-on experience in the clinic with the children, especially since that is one of the fields that I would like to work in. Also, it felt good to be able to help the woman who was depressed and to actually have anti-depressant medicine that they otherwise might not have had if we hadn't come in January. It was a life-changing experience that everyone must embark upon."
—Nadra Nash '03*

"My two favorite memories from the trip are playing soccer with the children at the coffee co-op and seeing the expressions on the kids' faces when we took Polaroid pictures in the clinic."
—Morgan Paige '03*

"Both my heart and my mind wish they were back in Nicaragua. I want to be feeling pain in my lower back as I shovel, tie rebar or lay block. I want to be taking a bumpy bus ride to a beautiful or disturbing site. I want to be sitting in the dorm discussing the day's events or playing Trivial Pursuit. I want to be eating rice and beans and fresh pineapple in the house ... the trip exceeded my expectations in every respect."

SHEDDING LIGHT ON
sexual assault at Bucknell

A night gone wrong

By Michelle Dombeck

After a letter was sent home to the parents of all male students attending the University, many members of the campus community became concerned that the University's judicial system neglected the accused. Debates about the justice of the University's sexual assault policies began with two students whose lives were permanently altered by the events of an October night.

For both Vicki Swinnerton '05 and expelled University student Tareq Abdulghani, memories of the night of Oct. 12, 2002 have become a nightmare of contradictions. Vicki claims that she was raped on that night. She is still awaiting the results of Tareq's appeal, which may allow him to return to campus. Tareq claims that the events of that evening were consensual, and is fighting to have his expulsion overturned and return to the University.

Their conflict has brought a massive debate to campus—was a student unfairly convicted by an ambiguous and biased system?

Between Nov. 1, 2001 and Nov. 15, 2002, three incidents of rape were tried before the Sexual Assault Hearing Board at the University. Insight into the judicial system

By Elisabeth Salemme

The University's judicial response to sexual assault is a process based on preponderance of evidence. Some argue that this system is unfairly biased in favor of the aggrieved party and marginalizes the rights of the respondent, while administrators describe the process as "educational."

Stanley Cavell was presented with the University's most prestigious award, the award of merit, on Wednesday evening prior to giving his lecture "The Philosophy of the Day After Tomorrow."

"This was one of the few instances where someone was so intelligent, it was frightening," said University President Steffen Rogers, summing up the feelings of many regarding Cavell's lecture Wednesday night.

Rogers introduced Cavell, explaining the characteristics and background that made him worthy of such an award. Cavell graduated with a degree in music from University of California at Berkley and then went on to pursue a Doctorate in Philosophy form Harvard University.

Calling Cavell "a man of profound intellect, modesty and compassion," Rogers presented him with a medal on an orange and blue ribbon to mark the honor.

After receiving this tribute, Cavell took the podium to begin the night's lecture.

"After receiving such an award as the Bucknell award of merit, one must ask oneself what has attributed to such an honor. I attribute it to two pieces of luck," Cavell said of his experiences at Berkley and Harvard and his sense to trust students. "I learned to recognize the fact that they [students] were the future of the intellectual world."

Cavell said he is grateful for the University's welcome and the honor bestowed upon him.

"Nowhere have I felt more welcome and comfortable than in my visits to Bucknell University, and I thank you for that," Cavell said.

Cavell's lecture drew on the work and ideas of past philosophers Ludwig Wittgenstein, Austin, Friedrich Nietzsche and Ralph Waldo Emerson. Even the title was taken from the ideas of Nietzsche, and his German translation of "the day after tomorrow." According to Cavell, this translates to an "after, over or super morning. Nietzsche describes this as a day realized. It is the day conceived by the super-man and day which creates the super-man." Cavell said his philosophy "calls for a new idea of knowledge, followed by the existence of silence, followed by the point of speech."

> "This was one of the few instances where someone was so intelligent, it was frightening."
> —Steffen Rogers, University president

Cavell outlined this philosophy through a variety of points, the first being that of impasses that occur between teachers and students in the process of learning.

"At some point in teaching, the student must know when and how to go on alone. At this point of impasse, and this point of silence, the teacher must know to allow this silence or to reason against it," Cavell said.

This concept was intriguing to graduate student Cindy Wentzler.

"The idea of a teacher being silent I thought was really interesting," Wentzler said.

From this concept of silence between teacher and student, Cavell moved to a broader point, speaking of silence in general. His emphasis was on the point of speech, not the speech itself.

"The point exceeds the saying, Because the saying is vulnerable," Cavell said. "Finding speech pointless is a characteristic disappointment if investigated. What is said must be worth saying, and teaching must undertake to show a reason for speaking at all."

Cavell related this philosophy to the works of Jane Austen and George Eliot. Specifically he drew links between Austen's "Emma" and "Mansfield Park," and Eliot's "Middlemarch." In these novels, Cavell saw the everyday aspiration to further yourself or, as he said, "the moral aspiration to the unattained but attainable self."

Cavell offered answers to answer past philosophical questions, such as Nietzsche's question of separation, referencing them to pieces of literature, such as "Middlemarch."

The evening closed with an open period for questions from audience members. Cavell's speech was less formal during this period, and he was able to answer questions as to his opinion on crossing academic boundaries between literature and philosophy, and the difference between falling silent and being silenced.

"I am in a state of shock at the high quality intelligence of his mind," Rogers said. "This is one of the few instances where someone was so intelligent it was frightening."

Catholic Church faces crisis; has hope for transformation

Religious men and women from various dioceses recognized the state of crisis in which the Catholic Church currently finds itself, but also revealed their hopes and sincere beliefs that this crisis will bring about a necessary transformation within the church in a panel discussion in the LC Forum on Feb. 12.

On behalf of Campus Catholic Ministry, Father Marty Moran, the University's Catholic chaplain, welcomed the audience of students, Lewisburg citizens and local clergy to the Catholic lecture series entitled "Serving the Catholic Church in Crisis."

"I think, as we have seen in the press in the past few months, there have been some issues that we need to address in the Catholic community," Moran said.

Moran and Sister Deborah Marie Borneman served as the facilitators of the discussion, providing some background information for the audience and asking three core questions to which the panel was to respond.

Last June, Catholic bishops met in Dallas to "essentially break the silence and to talk about the scandal in the Church involving the sexual abuse of minors," Borneman said. "The important part of them gathering together is that this session was geared not only for them to speak about this issue but more importantly come up with some concrete resolutions, and more specifically, a charter to address this issue of sexual scandal in the Church."

This charter affects all church affiliates from Catholic Youth Organization sports coaches to priests and bishops by claiming a commitment to deal appropriately and effectively with both present and past cases of sexual abuse of minors.

In the preamble of this charter, the opening statement says, "The Church of the United States is experiencing a crisis without precedent in our time."

After this passage was read, each member of the panel was asked to respond with his or her own thoughts as to whether he or she believed the current condition of the church to be a state of crisis.

Although the panel did agree that the Catholic Church was facing a crisis, the members also saw this predicament as an opportunity for change.

"I believe that we are in a crisis, but I also really believe that God is still present in the Church. From this evil action that certain individuals committed, I think it is going to lead to a stronger church and a different church," Brother Robert Ziobro said.

Ziobro also mentioned that he expects a greater involvement of laypeople in church decisions.

The second formalized question asked the panel members why they would invite new individuals to join the clergy at such a time of crisis.

> "I believe that we are in a crisis, but I also really believe that God is still present in the Church. From this evil action that certain individuals committed, I think it is going to lead to a stronger church and a different church."
> —Brother Robert Ziobro

Sister Charlene Diorka brought up the point that not everyone within the church is corrupt or is struggling with his or her spirituality.

"There are still people who still believe wholeheartedly in their call," Diorka said.

Brother Robert Schaefer also reminded the panelists and the audience that it is God who makes the calling, not the clergy.

"I think God continues to call and I think the call gets stronger when there is a crisis in the Church," Schaefer said.

The last question asked by the facilitator inquired as to why the panel members felt young adults were still coming to church today.

"I think one of the common questions that people ask is, 'Is this all there is? I thought that this was what I wanted. I accomplished this and achieved that, but it is seemingly empty. I have everything objectively that looks like a good life, but if this is all there is, then I don't seem to have much,'" Diorka said. "So, it is a search for meaning, to live somehow with a little more significance."

She also said that this quest for meaning ultimately revolves around God, and that the church provides a large group of people to support one another.

"I think this crisis shows the strength that they have on a personal level, because this crisis has challenged the image of the Church that they represent," Monica Lancellotti '05 said in response to the lecture. "I found it reassuring. There is hope in the church, and good can come out of this."

Third Eye Blind to play spring concert

Rock band scheduled to perform inaugural concert in Sojka Pavilion on April 4

By Sandi-Jo Galati
Associate Editor

The Concert Committee announced that Third Eye Blind will perform the spring concert on April 4 in the Sojka Pavilion. The opening act has not been scheduled, but the Concert Committee expects a confirmation within the next week.

According to Assistant Dean of Students and Director of Campus Activities and Programs Kari Conrad and Concert Committee Co-Chair Perry Ratcliffe '03, the committee chose the rock band with the intention of providing an exciting atmosphere for the campus in the newly opened pavilion.

"We wanted to open the pavilion with a concert that would appeal to the entire campus and really get people excited," Conrad said.

Students agree that the band is an appropriate selection for the christening of the pavilion as an entertainment venue.

"Third Eye Blind is the band that can open Sojka Pavilion the way it should be," Barry DeSain '04 said.

The band's visit to the University, occurring during the beginning leg of its summer tour, will provide fans with a sneak preview of the band's new album, "Out of the Vein," scheduled for release on April 29.

Third Eye Blind has released two other albums. Their multiplatinum self-titled 1997 album included the hits "Semi-Charmed Life," "Jumper" and "How's it Going to Be." The band's second album, "Blue," released in 1999, included the hits "Deep Inside of You" and "Never Let you Go."

> —Kari Conrad, director of Campus Activities and Programs

Khanh Le '03 has been a loyal fan of the band since hearing its first albums, and is anticipating the release of "Out of the Vein" and the upcoming concert.

"I listened to Third Eye Blind a lot in high school. I really enjoyed their first two albums and I'm really excited about seeing them at the University," Le said.

According to Ratcliffe, the Concert Committee chose Third Eye Blind based on the results of a student survey.

"We sent out a campus survey last semester and Third Eye Blind was way at the top," Ratcliffe said.

The Concert Committee planned the event with several other on-campus events in mind. The concert will correspond with Siblings Weekend, Black Arts Weekend and Phi Kappa Psi's "Battle of the Bands."

"It is a really big weekend on campus, so we are very excited," Ratcliffe said.

Both Ratcliffe and Conrad are anticipating an enthusiastic student response to the concert and feel that the band will appeal to the music tastes of students.

"Third Eye Blind is by far the most overall talented and quality band Bucknell has seen in many years," DeSain said.

Tickets can be purchased for floor seating or for stand seating and will be available to the University community for $25 beginning March 17 at the LC and Weis Center box offices. Tickets will be will go on sale to the public on March 24 for $35. Cash, check, credit cards or BU ID can be used for payment.

Forum gives possible implications of war

By Michael Dudzinski
Staff Writer

The Iraq forum on Feb. 13 provided the Bucknell community with an opportunity to discuss, amid a variety of perspectives, the implications of another war against Iraqi President Saddam Hussein.

Moderator Stephen Stamos, professor of international relations, opened with an excerpt of Sen. Robert Byrd's, D-W.Va., speech to Congress, cautioning engagement in a war in which the public has been given little information.

What is the real motive for replacing Saddam? The three panelists eloquently addressed an abundance of underlying causes.

One of the fundamental objectives for replacing Saddam is "a strategy of global proportions," according to Hilbourne Watson, professor of international relations.

Noting the trend of withering national borders and capitalism based upon global interdependence, Watson argued democratizing Iraq would remedy the "weak global economic situation." Iraq is second to Saudi Arabia in terms of the world's largest oil reserves, and the United States considers that to be far too powerful a weapon for a dictator who has grown increasingly wary of the U.S. since the Iran-Contra scandal.

Tansa Massoud, associate professor of political science, said that regime change was unacceptable before 9-11, yet it has become the hallmark of President George W. Bush's unilateral and pre-emptive doctrine. Although regime change would serve as a "quick fix," containment can still be achieved through a rigorous approach and would ensure stability in the Middle East region. Although it has been argued that sanctions (through containment) were responsible for Iraq's humanitarian problems during the 1990s, Massoud suggested that the sanctions stigma actually stemmed from administrative ineffectiveness. He added that containment would work if there were a joint commitment among the U.N. Security Council members to "keep the no-fly zones, come up with a new inspections regime, implement a military presence in the region and strengthen sanctions."

Massoud's discussion suggests that pressure on Iraq may very well consist of ulterior motives that the Bush administration is unwilling to reveal. After all, "why is Bush targeting Iraq as a case in the War on Terror when Iraq does not support terrorists?"

Watson said that this war would likely exceed the $232 billion mark, and postwar stability still remains questionable. Given that "weapons of mass destruction are an excuse from the Bush administration to achieve further ends," Watson said, "Iraq has much greater global implications than Iraq alone."

Professor of Management, William Gruver, agreed with Watson that the price of this war is significant because it will be "our children," who foot the bill for a cause that has been withheld from the American people.

Watson argued that a democratic government in Iraq would only serve to fit the oil interests of the United States.

"The removal of Saddam is about restructuring the world to the interests of the United States, and is something to worry about," Watson said, suggesting that globalization has slowly undermined national borders.

Gruver questioned the legitimacy of action in Iraq with a personal account of war.

"Lyndon Johnson's inappropriate use of the military has taken very many friends from me," Gruver said.

He also said, referring to the Vietnam War outcome, "The answer of who will win lies in whose harmony will last longer; Iraq's or the United States?"

Gruver said this is one situation where he is having trouble justifying military action. Rather than market war as an appropriate means of pre-emption, he would like to see the United States engage in a peace agreement between the Israelis and the Palestinians.

Gruver said that such a measure "would serve as a model to other nations and an opportunity for the United States to implement a more appropriate strategy in today's world."

There is much information in need of assessment before any decision resulting in war with Iraq can be made. The initiative taken by the University community to consider such implications of another war serves as an ideal model to the rest of America and its allies.

Students, faculty and staff lined the pathways of the uphill LC Friday to join in a community peace vigil. Participants held posters and distributed information about the effects of a war on Iraq.

"Most people were there because they do not believe we should currently be going to war with Iraq. We were also trying to increase student awareness of our views and the corresponding reasons with the flyers we were handing out," Daniel Morel '03 said.

According to Morel, the vigil was the idea of faculty and staff who wished to express their views on a possible war on Iraq. The Bucknellians for Peace were asked to help with advertising and organization of the event.

"It sought to encourage more open discussion of the current international situation," Associate Professor of Psychology Kimberly Daubman said.

Jon Hoyle, president of Bucknellians for Peace, said this vigil was a much greater success than others the group has organized in the past.

"There were a larger number of people involved with it, so it was more difficult to ignore us," Hoyle said.

Hoyle estimated between 75-100 people supported the vigil.

"Our vigil at Bucknell on [last] Friday is just one of many small and large demonstrations occurring locally, nationally and across the world. I think all of the actions taken as a whole are making it harder for the U.S. and the U.K. to go forward with their plans to invade Iraq with massive firepower," Daubman said.

According to Morel, there are ripple effects to actions that create awareness.

"For the sake of increasing student awareness on campus, yes, this vigil was a success," Morel said.

It may help to increase understanding and continue to shape opinion concerning the war.

Demonstrators held signs with slogans including "Dare to Wage Peace," "Negotiation not Annihilation," "Choose Peace Over Violence" and "By What Example Will We Lead?"

Bucknellians for Peace plans to continue periodically hanging up flyers around campus and in the LC mall.

According to Hoyle, there has been discussion about organizing a weekly vigil on campus if war is declared.

A night gone wrong

by Michelle Dombeck

Tareq Abdulghani, 20, was attending classes a few months ago at the University. Now, he is at home in Ohio, appealing a University judicial decision on Nov. 24, 2002, that found him guilty of raping Vicki Swinnerton '05 and expelled him from the University.

Christina Abdulghani, Tareq's mother, sent home a letter on Jan. 28 to the parents of all male students at the University. In the letter, she claims that her son is innocent and was not provided with sufficient evidence on which to build a defense. Her letter, which claims that the University's judicial system has many flaws, has caused fear and anger in many parents and students.

One night, two stories

Tareq and Vicki only knew each other vaguely from a class. When they saw each other at a registered Sigma Chi Fraternity party on Oct. 12, 2002, they started chatting and eventually danced together.

"At the party I met this girl—she called out my name as I walked by her. I had only really known her face from class so she told me her name….We chatted for a little bit about class and then we parted. Later on that same evening she … left the guy she was dancing with and came over to me. She started dancing with me and we were making out on the dance floor," Tareq said.

Vicki said she had been drinking, but not very much. Tareq denied either of them had been drinking.

"While we were dancing, he pulled a beer out of his pocket and said 'You need another beer,' and handed it to me. Overall, I had 2.5-3 beers over the night, which was over a few hours. I have a high tolerance, so that wasn't a problem," Vicki said.

"She wasn't acting drunk, however, and at trial she stated that she was not drunk. I also had not been drinking," Tareq said.

After dancing, the two left and headed for Bucknell West.

"We probably danced for over an hour and then noticed that it was getting late. We walked outside the back of Sig Chi and were talking. During this time I learned that she also lived in the Mods. I told her I was heading home and asked if she wanted to walk back together. She told me that she always went home with her roommate. She told me that when we found her we could all walk home together, the three of us. I helped her find her roommate and we left," Tareq said.

"My friend said that she was ready to go and I looked at him and I said, 'I have to leave.' Then he said 'No, Vicki, you don't have to go.' And I said, 'Yeah, I do,' and he looked at his friends and said, 'This always happens to me.' I didn't hear that at the time—I heard him mumble something, but my friend heard him. Then he said, 'I'll walk you girls back because I live in the Mods, too,'" Vicki said.

The two lived on different ends of Bucknell West, so when the time came for them to part, Vicki did not go back to her Mod.

"We got to the 'Y' at the Bucknell entrance, and he had his arm around my shoulders. We were walking and he started pulling me towards the highway, and my friend and I were starting to go towards the bridge because we live closer to the underpass than the main road. We said, 'Our Mod is this way,' and he said, 'But my Mod is this way.' We didn't want to walk alone so we went along with it," Vicki said.

According to Vicki, he asked her to go back to his Mod. Tareq disagrees.

"We got to the bushes through the shortcut and we were standing by the bushes where we would go to our Mods and he would go to his. He said, 'Hey, do you just want to come hang out for a while?' I didn't see a problem with it because we had class together, so I said, 'OK, that's fine.' My friend said, 'Vicki, why don't you come back with me?' He said, "No, Vicki's going to come hang out for a while. She'll be back.' I told my friend not to worry about it and that I was only going to be there for a few minutes. I intended on going in and hanging out for five minutes and then leaving," Vicki said.

"We walked back to the Mods and when we got to the entrance of the Mods we stopped. Her Mod was in a different direction from mine. I told her I was going home and she decided by herself—and I stress that—she wanted to go with me and not with her roommate. She said goodbye to her roommate and walked back with me," Tareq said.

Once inside, Tareq claimed that he introduced her to his roommates, who were watching something on television. Vicki said that he did not introduce her to them.

Tareq stressed that everything

> "We got to the bushes through the shortcut and we were standing by the bushes where we would go to our Mods and he would go to his. He said, 'Hey, do you just want to come hang out for a while?' I didn't see a problem with it because we had class together, so I said, 'OK, that's fine.' My friend said, 'Vicki, why don't you come back with me?' He said, "No, Vicki's going to come hang out for a while. She'll be back.'" that went on in his room was consensual, but Vicki said it was not. Tareq declined to go into detail about what exactly happened, but Vicki said that he was very forceful.
> —Vicki Swinnerton '05

"He kept kissing me and then right away he just went for my pants. I grabbed his hands and looked him in the eye and said, 'No, I have a rule—my pants stay on.' I was very direct about it and he said, 'OK.' He started kissing me again and a few minutes later he just kept trying, and every time he tried I said, 'No, my pants stay on.' I kept rebuttoning and rezipping them … he was being very forceful—he wasn't speaking or looking at me in the eye. At that point I was scared and I didn't know what to do….He pulled my pants off and pinned me down—he put his hand on my shoulder, pinned me down and pulled his pants down—that's when he raped me," Vicki said.

Tareq said that his window was open and his roommates were outside in the lounge area the whole time. Afterward, he said she gave no indication, to either him or his roommates, that she was afraid.

Vicki said that after she left his Mod, she simply acted as if things were normal and nothing had happened.

"My friends asked if I was OK, and I said 'Yeah, I'm fine.' I didn't want to believe that anything had happened. I wanted to push that as far away as I could. I went back to my Mod and I was making jokes, trying to shrug it off because I didn't want to believe that it had just happened," Vicki said.

Telling a secret

Vicki said that she kept the rape secret for about three weeks.

"I didn't want to believe that it had happened—I didn't want to say the words. I held it all inside. I overcompensated with jokes, trying to act normal. I couldn't concentrate or do anything. I tried to tell my roommates so many times, but I couldn't find the words," Vicki said.

When Vicki finally told her friends, it was very difficult for her.

"One night I came home and I was upset and saying how I hated men, especially him because he assaulted me. I had mentioned to my friends that he was rough and not very considerate, but I didn't tell them any more than that," Vicki said. "My roommate asked me the next day what I meant about that, and I sat down to tell her and I danced around what had really happened. As soon as I said he raped me, I broke down in tears. That's the worst thing ever to have to say. I just cried. I just talked … and we just all cried."

After talking to someone from the Women's Resource Center, going to Psychological Services and talking with Associate Dean of Students Kari Conrad, Vicki decided to press University charges.

The hearing process

When Tareq was notified of the charge on Nov. 6, 2002, he received the charge of Level One Sexual Assault (as defined on page 43 of the Student Handbook), the name of the accuser and the date. He had no other information on which he could prepare a defense.

Vicki said that he did not receive her incident statement because he did not provide one.

"I submitted a statement of what had happened that evening, and he could have received that if he had submitted one himself," Vicki said. "Conrad would have gotten each of them and exchanged, but he chose not to submit a statement, so he never got mine. She had told him that, but he apparently decided not to."

Conrad said that statements are swapped so that both parties have the same information at the same time.

Tareq and his mother disagree with this policy. They claim the Student Handbook does not state that the accused only receive a statement if they submit one.

The Student Handbook is not entirely clear on this matter. On page 19 of the Student Handbook, it states, "A statement from the victim must accompany the charge indicating the basis for making a charge."

"Conrad just said that it was her interpretation of the handbook that it's an exchange of statements," Christina said.

Without any statements, Tareq said it was almost impossible to prepare a defense.

> "Even though there's a concern for false accusations, we really want women to come forward. I don't want women to not come forward just because they're afraid that they won't be believed."
> —Mary Snyder, interim director of the Women's Resource Center

"If they give you nothing, how can you mount a defense? How am I supposed to prepare questions and a response if I don't know what the other person's going to say?" Tareq said. "There was lots of stuff that was impossible to prepare for. You're expected to prove your innocence. The only thing the board would say is, 'Well, why would she lie?' You're guilty unless you can prove against her!"

Witnesses may be added up until 24 hours before the hearing. Conrad said this is to protect both parties, in case a witness comes up at the end and either party would like to add that person for whatever reason.

Tareq and his mother feel that there are several problems with this witness system. They claim that not only is 24 hours not enough time to prepare for a witness, witnesses may also submit statements without actually being present. If this happens, there is no chance for either party to question the witness.

According to Conrad, witnesses are allowed to submit statements or taped testimony very infrequently.

"That hasn't happened in a long time. The language is still [in the handbook], but we ask that if someone is going to have a witness, that they be there. Witnesses are almost always there," Conrad said.

Conrad was unsure of what would happen if either party wanted to question the testimony of a witness who was not present, saying she would consult the University's general counsel if a question were to arise.

In the Student Handbook it states that students are permitted to have one adviser from the University community who is not a lawyer. Christina said that in the past, the University did allow students legal counsel but stopped because lawyers "stop the University from circumventing rules."

Dean of Students Richard Ferraro said that the University has never allowed lawyers in these proceedings.

The Abdulghanis also feel that the hearing board may be biased.

"We can only question impartiality within 24 hours of receiving the charge, but you [aren't allowed to] remove people on the basis of political or personal bias. Unlike a court jury, the Community Judicial Board is made up of people who volunteer for the assignment. Although these people may be impartial, they may also have ideological reasons for volunteering," Christina said.

> "We walked back to the Mods and when we got to the entrance of the Mods we stopped. Her Mod was in a different direction from mine. I told her I was going home and she decided by herself—and I stress that—she wanted to go with me and not with her roommate. She said goodbye to her roommate and walked back with me."
> —Tareq Abdulghani

Conrad said that members of the board are told to remove themselves if they know either party, in order to prevent bias.

The members of the hearing board also receive training, which, according to the Abdulghanis, is unfair.

"You don't train jurors in the state legal system, but you train these people. Training people for something like a sexual assault hearing board may predispose them toward a certain viewpoint," Christina said.

The University's judicial system is unlike the legal system, where people are innocent unless proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. Like many of its peer institutions, the University employs a preponderance of evidence system. To be found guilty, the evidence must support "the position that the alleged violation more likely than not occurred in the way charged," as stated on page 30 of the Student Handbook.

Appealing

After the hearing, the board decided that the evidence indicated Tareq was responsible. His sentence was expulsion.

Tareq and his mother claim that, in addition to not knowing enough prior to the trial and not being allowed to have a lawyer present in the hearing, the administration has not been fair in the appeals process.

According to Tareq, the first appeal was unfairly denied.

"At the first appeal, they wouldn't allow me to even talk about the polygraph [which I had taken that indicated I was innocent]. They gave no reason for excluding it. They didn't listen to my offer to pay for her to take a polygraph or for her to have psychological tests to verify her statements," Tareq said. "It was at this hearing that the head of the original hearing board made the statement that 'declaring an event happened' is enough to call for a hearing and no other evidence is needed. This contradicts pages 19, 20 and 25 [of the Student Handbook]. They denied the appeal 5-0."

Once his first appeal was denied, the next appeal was to Ferraro.

"Ferraro tried to deny his appeal and pushed him to transfer, saying he was doing Tareq a favor and helping him get on with his life," Christina said. "He was very patronizing."

Ferraro said that the sentence of expulsion does not go on a student's transcript.

"A person who is separated from the University can still apply to 2,500 other universities and colleges. It is Bucknell's policy not to post notices of supsension or expulsion on the transcript--in contrast to what many other schools do. Bucknell regards these matters as private—since our conduct system is fundamentally an educationally based system, not a penal system," Ferraro said

The Abdulghanis also allege that Ferraro denied Tareq his right to come to campus for an appeal, alleging that Ferraro "didn't think [they] wanted to drive all the way from Ohio."

"Tareq wasn't given the chance to waive his right and come to Bucknell and appeal. Dean Ferraro just said 'No' after reading our letter," Christina said.

Tareq said Ferraro attempted to deny his appeal to University President Steffen Rogers.

"My mother said to Dean Ferraro that we were prepared to follow the procedures through to the final appeal to the president, if necessary. Dean Ferraro tried to dismiss this and said that there really wasn't any appeal to the president. In my letter [to Ferraro] of Dec. 31, I reminded Dean Ferraro of his violation of procedure by not allowing me an in-person hearing. I wrote asking him to rescind his decision, and added, 'In the alternative, please consider this an appeal to the president of the University under that same section of the disciplinary procedures, [referring to Part X] 'Appeal to the Dean of Students,'" Tareq said.

Ferraro said that even if an appeal goes through to the president, guilt cannot be removed.

"According to our system, the president cannot set aside the judgment of the hearing and appeals boards, but he can set aside the penalty. He can say you're guilty, but you will not be required to leave permanently. It's kind of like a governor's clemency," Ferraro said.

On the Abdulghani's Web site (http://www.studentrights.us/), they claim that because Ferraro overstepped his bounds, he had to step aside and allow Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 take over this appeal, which is normally handled by the dean of students.

"Dean Ferraro vacated his earlier [appeal] denial, and said Vice President [of Student Affairs Charles] Pollock would hear the new appeal. In his letter of Jan. 20, 2003, he wrote, 'Please understand that an appeal with Vice President Pollock represents the final appeal, whether the decision is positive or negative.' On Jan. 28, 2003, I wrote back reminding him again that the handbook allows an appeal to the president in cases of expulsion," Tareq said.

Tareq's appeal to Pollock was last Friday. The Abdulghanis are still awaiting the decision.

Ferraro did not comment on Tareq's case, stating that Bucknell has a policy of "not commenting on specific cases out of respect for personal privacy."

An angry letter

When Tareq was expelled, his mother began a campaign to publicize her son's situation. In a letter sent home to the all the parents of male University students, Christina claims that the University has no desire to find out the truth of the situation.

"I believe Bucknell does not care to find out what really happened," Christina wrote. "They want to protect a system that probably gets them points at any politically correct convention they attend. They are far more concerned with what is comfortable than with what is true."

In her letter, one piece of evidence Christina said the University has ignored is Tareq's polygraph tests, the results of which, she claims, show he is innocent.

"After the first hearing, Tareq requested an appeal hearing….He submitted the results of the polygraph test he had taken … all in the interest of reaching the truth….All of this information was dismissed," Christinia wrote.

Conrad said polygraph tests are not admissible because they are not found to be reliable.

Although the Abdulghanis admit that polygraph tests are not 100 percent accurate, they claim that with the University's preponderance of evidence system, it is ample evidence to support their cause.

"When I brought up the polygraph test in the appeal, they asked why I hadn't taken one and used that in the first hearing. How could I have taken a polygraph test when I didn't know all the accusations?" Tareq said. "They also said that they just don't take polygraphs. Where does it say that in the handbook?"

In addition to questioning the University's judicial policies, the letter has had other effects. One of them is making students and parents afraid.

On the Abdulghani's Web site, many unidentified parents are very upset at Tareq's situation.

"Your son's situation and Bucknell's response is disturbing. I hope that you and he will continue to fight and make people aware of the situation….Although I do not care for our 'litigation-happy' society, there are times when legal action is warranted. This situation seems to be one of those times. I hope that you are able to pursue this to the fullest extent of the law," one parent said.

Mary Snyder, interim director of the Women's Resource Center, said that she has heard of male students who are now afraid that they will get expelled for any minor offenses.

"You cannot get expelled for slapping someone on the butt. You can't even make a charge based on that, and I know it's going around campus," Snyder said. "There was actually a student who was really scared. I think that we need to dispel a lot of this."

Female students are also afraid now.

"Even though there's a concern for false accusations, we really want women to come forward," Snyder said. "I don't want women to not come forward just because they're afraid that they won't be believed."

Vicki said that she could understand why female students might be afraid now.

"If I had read that letter before I had told anyone, I probably wouldn't have told anyone. I was scared to come out and press charges as it was, but I wouldn't have done it if I had saw that letter first," Vicki said. "It's scary that people aren't going to believe you and you're going to get accused of all this stuff. It made it seem like girls at Bucknell are rapecriers and the men should be scared at women at Bucknell."

Vicki stressed that now she wants people to know that she is the female from the letter.

"The [parents who received the letter] don't know the situation—they're only hearing her biased side of it. It really makes Bucknell look bad. And it especially makes me look bad. That's why I want people to know it's me," Vicki said. "Why would anyone make this up? To go through, and to have gone through, what I'm going through isn't something I'd wish on my worst enemy. Who would do this for fun? It's ridiculous. I want people to know my name and who I am, and that I'm not the kind of person who would just do this. He brutally raped me."

Vicki declined to comment on if she planned to press civil or criminal charges.

Shedding Light on ...

insight into the JUDICIAL SYSTEM

by Elisabeth Salemme

Concerns about the sexual assault judicial policy at the University have recently been raised. A compilation of information from the Student Handbook, administrators and students provides a clearer understanding of the process at the Univeristy.

The victim of alleged sexual assault is defined by the Student Handbook as the aggrieved party and the alleged perpetrator is defined by the Student Handbook as the respondent.

Options for the aggrieved party

When sexual assault is committed at the University, and the aggrieved party has sought help at the variety of counseling and health resources on campus, there are three possible courses of action he or she can take.

According to the Student Handbook, the first option is mediation, which is voluntary for both parties, and is arranged by the Judicial Administrator for Sexual Assault (JASA) and conducted by a staff member who both parties agree on. Associate Dean of Students Kari Conrad serves as JASA at the University.

The role of the JASA, appointed by the dean of students, is to oversee the adjudication process along with other University officials. According to the Student Handbook, the JASA's responsibilities include to "meet with the respondent and aggrieved party, arrange for mediation or binding arbitration or a hearing, collect statements from the respondent, aggrieved party and witnesses; [be] present at the hearing; [and] advise the HBSA on matters of hearing procedures, question and precedent…."

Mediation allows the aggrieved party to meet with the respondent "to discuss the incident, to express his/her feelings regarding the incident, and to indicate the impact of the incident on him/her," according to the Student Handbook. After mediation, the aggrieved party may still file charges with the University judicial system. Information used or obtained during mediation may not be used in the University proceeding.

The second option for the aggrieved party is to press University judicial charges. When an aggrieved party files a charge of sexual assault, the respondent and the aggrieved party may agree to hold a judicial hearing on the matter. This process is confidential, is arranged by the JASA and is facilitated by a University staff member.

The University Community Judicial Board, composed of students and staff, selects members to be part of the Hearing Board on Sexual Assault (HBSA). The board is responsible for adjudicating all charges of sexual assault brought to its attention. The board determines whether or not the respondent is held responsible, and the board determines the punishment, which can include suspension or expulsion.

The third option for aggrieved parties, according to the Student Handbook, is to make external criminal charges. The aggrieved party may meet with the local district attorney to explore filing criminal charges. The University will not release the name of the aggrieved party unless he or she provides written permission.

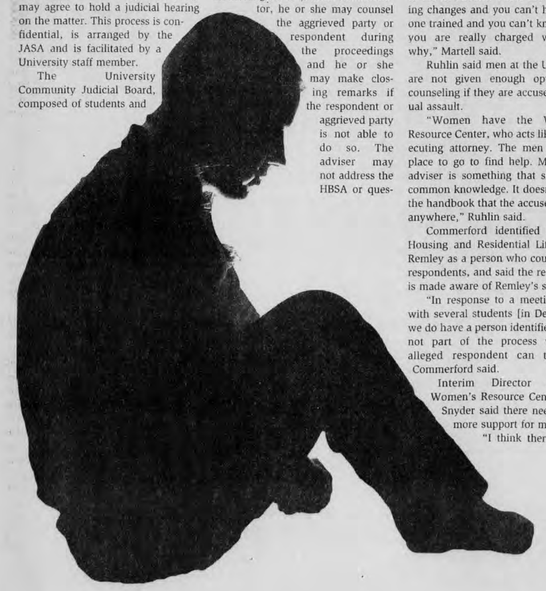
A new HBSA, drawn from members of the University Community Judicial Board, is appointed annually by the dean of students. The board is composed of two students, two faculty members and one administrator. Interim replacements may be appointed by the JASA if a member is unable to fulfill his or her duties. One member of the HSBA is appointed by the dean of students to be the chair of the board.

Meredith Field '04 is a member of the HBSA and said she does not think the selection process for HBSA is fair.

"I think we need to have a better method for choosing who becomes a part of the sexual assault board. It is hard to get on the regular board (Community Judicial Board), but once you are on that, all you have to do is say you want to be on the HBSA," Field said. "If you do agree to be on HBSA, you have to go through training, but the training here is really lacking. The process is about four hours long and you do it all in one sitting. It needs to be much more comprehensive."

Options for the respondent

According to the Student Handbook, both the respondent and aggrieved party have the right to seek the aid from an adviser from within the University community during a hearing. The role of the adviser is to help the respondent and aggrieved party prepare for the hearing and to explain the process. He or she is permitted to accompany the respondent or aggrieved party to interviews with an investigator or judicial administrator, he or she may counsel the aggrieved party or respondent during the proceedings and he or she may make closing remarks if the respondent or aggrieved party is not able to do so. The adviser may not address the HBSA or question any of the parties.



According to the Student Handbook, "Members of the University community who are practicing lawyers are ineligible to serve as an adviser to either the respondent or aggrieved party."

According to Assistant Dean of Students Gerald Commerford, "The University process in any sort of hearing does not permit a lawyer. This is an educational process, it's not a criminal process. Both the respondent and the aggrieved party are provided with the opportunity to have assistance from an adviser who is within the Universijy community."

Conrad said the respondent may seek legal advice from any attorney, either within or outside the University community.

"The only thing that can't happen is that the attorney cannot be present with a jury hearing, so many of our folks seek the advice of legal counsel to help them prepare for the hearing, to give them advice on whatever issue they want. So in no way, shape or form does our process dissuade them from doing that," Conrad said.

Conrad and Commerford said the reason the University does not allow either party to have a lawyer present during the hearing, is because it is not a criminal proceeding.

"We are not a courtroom. Our proceedings are very, very different than a courtroom's. We would have to get … everything that the legal system has and we are just not set up to do that. That is not to deny either party the opportunity to seek legal advice," Conrad said.

Conrad also said the difference between a criminal procedure and the procedure at the University is that "the worst possible outcome in our system is a separation from an institution."

Field suggested a neutral lawyer be present at the hearing to answer any questions members of the HBSA may have.

"A neutral lawyer, present during all the hearings, would help the board figure out what it can and cannot use….The only people we have to look to now to ask questions are the chair of the board and certain deans," Field said.

According to the Association for Student Judicial Affairs, which published a study in 2000 entitled "National Baseline Study on Campus Sexual Assault: Adjudication of Sexual Assault," 60 percent of institutions of higher learning allow the accused to bring an attorney to the hearing, while the same right is granted to 54 percent of victims.

Jay Martell '04 and Jim Ruhlin '04 are friends with Tareq Abdulghani, who was charged with sexual assault and was expelled from the University. They believe that there are problems with the University's judicial system for cases of sexual assault.

"The fact that you are not allowed to have anyone trained [as the adviser for the respondent] is a detriment to the defendant. These are life altering changes and you can't have anyone trained and you can't know what you are really charged with and why," Martell said.

Ruhlin said men at the University are not given enough options for counseling if they are accused of sexual assault.

"Women have the Women's Resource Center, who acts like a prosecuting attorney. The men have no place to go to find help. Maybe the adviser is something that should be common knowledge. It doesn't say in the handbook that the accused can go anywhere," Ruhlin said.

Commerford identified Dean of Housing and Residential Life Daniel Remley as a person who counsels the respondents, and said the respondent is made aware of Remley's services.

"In response to a meeting I had with several students [in December], we do have a person identified who is not part of the process who the alleged respondent can talk to," Commerford said.

Interim Director of the Women's Resource Center Mary Snyder said there needs to be more support for men.

"I think there should be someone that [men] can get in touch with or that would know the ins and outs of the way the process works. We are in the process of working on that. I do think that support is necessary," Snyder said.

Procedures before the hearing is held

After the aggrieved party has filed charges individually or jointly with a University representative, it is the role of the JASA to determine if there is sufficient evidence for a hearing to be held.

Conrad said the respondent is notified of the code of conduct that has been violated, as well at the date and the time at which the violation allegedly occurred.

"I have not seen that [just providing the date and time of the offense] has been a detriment to anyone, but certainly the University can look into requiring some specific level of specificity," Conrad said.

Conrad said that at the University, both the aggrieved party and the respondent may provide written statements for all parties involved to read.

"Both parties are afforded the opportunity to write a longer narrative, but sometimes what happens if that one party is not willing to do it, then the other party won't do it either," Conrad said. "So, for example, it could be offered to a respondent … if the respondent is willing to put down what [the respondent] believed happened on that night, the aggrieved party would be willing to put down in writing her perspective of what happened that evening. What aggrieved parties have not been willing to do is to put that in writing before the respondent does it so that that case is built upon."

The hearing will typically occur within 10 days of the presentation of the charges. An extension of three days can be granted by request of either party, and in certain circumstances, a longer delay can be granted by the dean of students by the request of either party.

"You have 10 days to prepare for something that will affect the rest of your life. You leave school right away if you are convicted. You go from being a regular student to being treated like a criminal," Ruhlin said.

Procedure for the hearing

At the University, the respondent, aggrieved party and HBSA have the right to present evidence and to present witnesses who are deemed relevant to the charges. Character witnesses are limited to two per party. Witnesses must be identified at least one day prior to the hearing and the chair of the HBSA can limit the number of witnesses if it seems repetitious. The one-day notice for witnesses can be waived if all parties agree to let the witness testify. Witnesses who are unable to appear at the time of the hearing may present a written statement or a tape of their testimonies.

Questioning is done by the HBSA, and is typically oral. Any participant may request for the questioning to be done in part or entirely through writing.

The HBSA adjudicates an alleged violation of the Conduct Standard on Sexual Assault. If any other alleged violation or confirmed violation occurred at the same time as the alleged sexual assault violation, that violation will be adjudicated concurrently by the board.

"Prior student violations do come into play quite significantly when a decision of responsibility is reached. The prior record is never opened up or introduced unless a decision of responsibility has been reached by the board. Only at that point during the sanctioning … is that file ever shared," Conrad said.

According to the Student Handbook, "The outcome of the hearing [is] rendered only on the basis of evidence relevant to the charge(s) which was presented at the hearing and not on irrelevant or external information or opinions about the background, personality or reputation of those involved."

Conrad said that irrelevant information often arises during hearings, and it is the responsibility of the HBSA to determine what information is pertinent and what is not.

"It is my obligation to make sure that witnesses that are allowed to testify are relevant witnesses, and I do that through constant advice from our legal counsel. He gives me advice as to whether that testimony would be relevant or not. During the actual hearing there is lots of relevant information that might come up … and it is up to the chair of the board to first indicate whether that's relevant or not," Conrad said. "Anybody can challenge that as well. Any board member, any respondent, any aggrieved party can challenge relevance issues at any point in time. If any relevance issues are ever challenged, then the whole board convenes and makes a decision about relevance."

According to the Student Handbook, "The basis for determining responsibility for a violation of the Conduct Standard on Sexual Assault by the HBSA is a preponderance of evidence that supports the position that the alleged violation more likely than not occurred in the way charged. There must be a vote in the affirmative by at least three of five HBSA members to reach a finding of responsibility for each charge."

> "There is a lack of due process in the system. I recognize that this is a private institution and that it is governed by its own policies but due process is a basic constitutional right that people aren't always afforded here."
> —Meredith Field '05, HBSA member*

"It is easier to convict in our system than in a criminal or civil case….I think that you would not be getting a whole lot of people coming forward if it were under a different standard of proof. I cannot give you any solid evidence to that fact, but one of the main reasons why our standard of proof is lower is because the worst possible outcome in our system is a separation from an institution," Conrad said.

It takes a vote of 3-to-2 to determine if the respondent is held responsible. Once a verdict of responsibility has been reached, the board votes again on the punishment. The only way a student can be expelled is if the second vote is unanimous for expulsion. If the vote for expulsion results in a 4-to-1 majority, the student will be suspended. If the vote for expulsion results in a 3-to-2 majority or less, then the board votes on a variety of other punishments listed in the Student Handbook.

Martell and Ruhlin said they have a problem with the burden of proof as being on a "preponderance of evidence" basis.

"At Bucknell it is a 51-49 [majority], whereas in real court, it is more like 75-25 or 85-15. In real court, you have to have real evidence going for you, not just he said/she said," Ruhlin said.

"Preponderance of evidence gets away from pursuing the truth," Martell said. "There doesn't need to be real discussion because all you need is a 51-49 [majority decision]."

According to the Association for Student Judicial Affairs, preponderance of evidence is the standard used by just over half of the boards adjudicating sexual assault cases on campuses.

"The one difference between the University standard in any case as opposed to a criminal case is that they operate on the beyond a reasonable doubt, and the University standard is what is more likely to have occurred than not. Once again, we are in an educational environment," Commerford said.

Conrad said the process of determining a verdict of responsibility is not easy.

"It's not just as simple as he said/she said. I can't recall a hearing that has lasted under five hours. So if you think about that, there's lots of information that's presented to the board, and at the end of the day, they have a standard of proof that they must use to determine whether that is more likely to have occurred or not," Conrad said.

Field does not think the process is fair.

"There is a lack of due process in the system. I recognize that this is a private institution and that it is governed by its own policies but due process is a basic constitutional right that people aren't always afforded here," Field said.

Conrad, Commerford and Snyder agreed that the process at the University is fair.

"I have been involved with two hearings, and I think it is a fair system. And I consider myself a fair person; I have a daughter and two sons and I do not think I could support a process that isn't fair," Snyder said.

Conrad said that the system is not gender-biased.

"It is really important to me that the process be a fair one for both parties. That is probably the most important thing in my role as JASA to make sure that the process is a fair one to both parties," Conrad said. "And we take the adjudication of the alleged violation really seriously. I have both sons and daughters and I don't want any process or anything to be unfair to either gender."

Commerford emphasized the importance of the fairness of the University's system.

"[The system is] absolutely fair. We've had our board on sexual assault for I would imagine 15 years, and it stands by itself … and I know I try and Dean Conrad tries to make things as clear and specific as possibly can be, and it's very, very important to both of us as members of this community and professionals in this field that it be done according to every procedure in the [Student Handbook]," Commerford said.

Sexual assault policies at other institutions

According the Student Handbook of Colgate University, when a person is accused of sexual assault, the disciplinary officer sends a letter in writing to the respondent stating "a specific description of the possible violation."

At Bucknell, the information Abdulghani was provided with was the date of the alleged assault, the name of the victim and that he was charged with level one sexual assault.

For the 2002-2003 school year, Harvard University adopted a new procedure for peer-on-peer misconduct, including sexual assault. Under the new procedure, a preliminary investigation is conducted to determine whether the complaint has the potential to be resolved through a hearing.

The first step for the procedure at Harvard is for the aggrieved party to submit to the university a detailed written statement that summarizes his or her complaint against the respondent, along with a descriptive list of all sources of information including people, correspondence, records and actions taken. After the statement is given, an initial investigation is opened.

The respondent is then informed of the allegations and is asked to prepare a written statement, as well as a list of sources supporting the information he or she has provided.

At Bates College in Maine, it states specifically in the Student Handbook that both the accused and accusing student may seek personal support from any member of the Bates community both before and during the hearing. This support person is separate from the student's hearing adviser. The support person may attend the student's pre-hearing and may speak with the student during the actual hearing, but may not ask questions or give testimony during the hearing. The Health Center will also provide support to both parties.

The Bates Student Handbook also explains the role of Judicial Educators during the adjudication process.

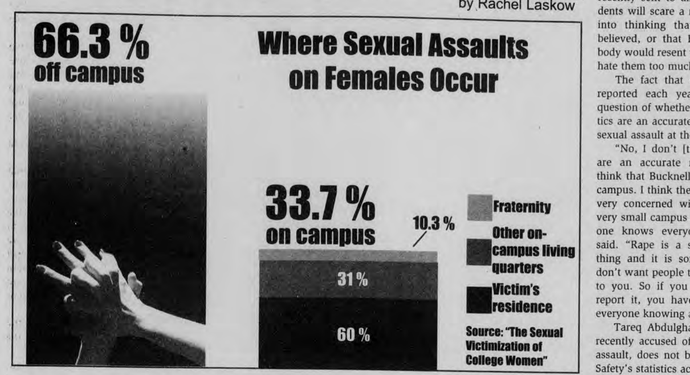
According to the Bates handbook, "The Judicial Educators serve as resource persons, not currently associated with the SCC or the Dean of Students Office, who are available to explain the disciplinary procedures of the college….The Judicial Educators are available to the students even before an investigation is begun by the Deans."

… Sexual Assault at Bucknell

An inside look at statistics

"If there is a sexual assault on campus, we want that matter to be dealt with honestly and justly."
—Dean Ferraro

by Rachel Laskow



Between Nov. 1, 2002 and Nov. 15, 2002 there were three reported rape incidents at the University that went to trial. According to Dean of Students Richard Ferraro, there were several other cases. It is important to keep in mind that students often do not report sexual assaults to University officials, and instead just keep it to themselves or tell a confidante. This article examines how University statistics and relate to nationwide ones.

The stats

According to Ferraro, each quarter he meets with members from Public Safety, the Office of Housing and Residential Life, Psychological Services, Student Health Services, as well as others to discuss instances of sexual assault at the University. These statistics are reported each quarter in Notes and Notices.

Public Safety's Web site has an annual compilation of these statistics in a format required by the Clery Act and compatible with the FBI national reporting format. The Clery Act requires that the University keep a public record of all on-campus sexual assaults that were reported to Public Safety. Once verified as true, sexual assaults must be listed in Public Safety's daily and annual reports, as a result of The Student Right-To-Know and Campus Security Act of 1990.

Although Director of Public Safety Vincent DeCerchio said the University complies with the act, only 36.5 percent of schools reported crime statistics in a manner fully consistent with the Clery Act, according to the 2002 "Campus Sexual Assault: How America's Institutions of Higher Education Respond."

The University's statistics are also sent to the Pennsylvania State Police for its annual report. The state police send the statistics to the FBI for inclusion in its annual national statistics report.

Sexual assault statistics are published in Public Safety's daily police crime and safety logs, as well as The Bucknellian's Public Safety Log. Hard copies of the information are also available.

"We do not learn about some sexual offenses until the quarterly sexual assault reporting group meeting when we review those cases reported confidentially to staff to determine their validity," DeCerchio said. "After these meetings, the Dean of Students Office reports these in a publication and we add them to our log and annual statistics."

Despite the fact that sexual assault is a concern at the University, some students feel that the information is not as readily available as it could be.

"I think sexual assault is a problem, but I don't really know a lot about it. [The University] doesn't publicize it a lot," Tim Spann '03 said.

Although the information is not as accessible as some would like, Ferraro is insistent that the University does not want to cover up rape.

"If there is a sexual assault on campus, we want that matter to be dealt with honestly and justly," Ferraro said.

Many students were not aware of the number of sexual assaults that occur at the University each year and were surprised when they heard about Public Safety's statistics.

"I think sexual assault is more common at Bucknell than people think. I would think a lot more have occurred," Emily Resnick '03 said.

Sexual assault still proves to be a problem at the University, even though few cases are reported.

"If one women gets raped on campus, that's enough for us to be concerned," Interim Director of the Women's Resource Center Mary Snyder said.

Ferraro also feels that people should focus less on the statistics and worry more about the problem.

"On a certain level, it is really not terribly meaningful if the number of college women that has been assaulted by graduation is 25 percent (the one in four statistic that is often cited) or a lower percentage such as 20 percent or 10 percent. We really need to eradicate sexual assault, whether it is slightly more or less prevalent, because it has such an awful effect on people's lives," Ferraro said.

Unreported cases

A study conducted by National Institute of Justice and Bureau of Justice Statistics, U.S. Department of Justice, "The Sexual Victimization of College Women," shows that less than 5 percent of completed or attempted rapes against college women were reported to law enforcement. In two-thirds of the incidents, the victim did tell another person, usually a friend, not family or school officials.

Sexual assault survivor Vicki Swinnerton '05 said that she first told her friends about her rape, rather than law enforcement.

"I did the same thing and I did it partly because I waited to tell anyone. I didn't know if I had enough evidence to press criminal charges. I mean, I have the truth on my side, but the law enforcement officials and juries, etc. don't know me. They have no idea who to believe," Swinnerton said. "Also, it is hard enough to tell anyone, let alone complete strangers. I told my best friends first. I didn't want to tell my parents because he had already hurt me and I didn't want them to hurt because of him and what he did as well. It was one of the hardest things I have ever had to tell them."

Ferraro said that there is always an element of uncertainty regarding the percentage of sexual assaults that are reported.

"It is absolutely clear that sexual assault is underreported and that almost has to be the case since such a very personal and traumatic matters are frequently involved. But it's hard to know how much they are underreported," Ferraro said.

Marc Lewis '06, who is part of the One in Four program, also said that sexual assaults at the University are often not reported.

"I have heard of at least one event already this year, and I am not in a particular position where people would come to me about it," Lewis said. "I would think that the letter recently sent to all of the male students will scare a number of victims into thinking that they won't be believed, or that Bucknell's student body would resent them and doubt or hate them too much."

The fact that so few cases are reported each year brings up the question of whether or not the statistics are an accurate representation of sexual assault at the University.

"No, I don't [think the statistics are an accurate representation]. I think that Bucknell is such a private campus. I think the students here are very concerned with image. It is a very small campus and almost everyone knows everyone," Swinnerton said. "Rape is a scary and serious thing and it is something that you don't want people to know happened to you. So if you press charges or report it, you have to worry about everyone knowing and judging you."

Tareq Abdulghani, 20, who was recently accused of level one sexual assault, does not believe that Public Safety's statistics accurately represent what happens in the University's judicial system.

"I know a student whose charge of forcible rape occurred in 2001. I don't know that many people, but if it happened to one person I know during that year, it's possible that it happened to some that I don't know," Abdulghani said. "The problem as I can see it is that Bucknell leaves out the case or doesn't report them to Public Safety. Therefore, they are not in the official crime statistics which must be made available."

Other stats

Between Aug. 15, 2002 and Nov. 15, 2002 there were two reported rape incidents at Bucknell that went to trial.

A 2000 study reports the victimization rate was 27.7 rapes per 1,000 female college students.

Females as victims

34 percent of the men in a sample of 204 university students found that they were verbally coerced, physically restrained, intimidated or physically harmed in some way to perform an act that can be defined as sexual assault.

Males as victims

Where sexual assaults occur

Public Safety reports that there were two reported nonforcible sex offenses at the University in 2001. Administrative Lieutenant James Middleton said these cases are verifiable. Both occurred at campus residential facilities. According to DeCerchio, nonforcible sex offenses are sex with a legally underaged person with or without his or her consent. There was also one forcible sex offense that occurred on public property.

"The Sexual Victimization of College Women" shows that of victims of completed rape, 33.7 percent were victimized on campus and 66.3 percent off campus. The report also shows that for completed rapes, nearly 60 percent that took place on campus occurred in the victim's residence, 31 percent occurred in other living quarters on campus and 10.3 percent occurred at a fraternity.

Despite the University's statistic of reported sex offenses, Swinnerton agrees with the national statistic.

"I think that it may be because there are always people out and about on campus and there is more chance of getting caught. I think that it is true

Males are also victims

The majority of victims who report sexual assaults are females, but males are also victims of sexual assault. Since he has been at the University, Assistant Dean of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Lewis Marrara has not heard of any cases of males being sexually assaulted here, but he has seen it at other schools, such as Virginia Tech. Marrara is currently working on his dissertation of male survivors of sexual assault.

According to "Archives of Sexual Behavior," a study of 204 university students found that 34 percent of the men in the survey were verbally coerced, physically restrained, intimidated or physically harmed in some way to perform an act that can be defined as sexual assault.

Despite the fact that males are victims of sexual assault, there are not as many resources on campus for them.

"If I were a 20-year-old male and sexually assaulted, I would be hesitant to go to a women's center," Marrara said.

Marrara said when he was in college, males would not have come forward if they were sexually assaulted.

One in four

Perhaps the most well-known sexual assault statistic at the University is the one in four statistic, which originates from a 1994 national study. The University started the One in Four program as a response to women's sexual victimization. According to a national survey of over 6,000 college students, one in four women reported that they had experienced a rape or an attempted rape since the age of 14.

Bonnie Fisher, an author of "The Sexual Victimization of College Women," reminds people to keep in mind that the one in four statistic is a lifetime estimate, where her study deals with a school year.

At Bucknell, and other universities around the country, the One in Four program helps people understand sexual assault, how it hurts people and how they can help someone who discloses an incident sexual assault to them.

"What we started finding out was that people really wanted to know how to help a sexual assault survivor. What we ask at the beginning of every program now is, 'How many have had your lives touched by sexual assault, someone close to you or a family member,' and over half of the group will raise their hands," Snyder said.

According to campssafety.org, Lehigh University had zero reported incidents of forcible rape in 2001. Bloomsburg University had one reported incident.

Although Bucknell's and other universities' numbers appear to be low, the 2000 report "The Sexual Victimization of College Women" shows that the victimization rate was 27.7 rapes per 1,000 female college students. The study also shows that some women were victimized more than once, making the rate of incidents 35.3 per 1,000 female students. A campus that has 10,000 women could potentially have more than 350 rape incidents in a given academic year.

Varying data and false reports

One reason sexual assault statistics vary is because of where the data is collected.

"You can't always extrapolate from the Midwest or a college in the Midwest and use that in our college or area. I think that's very illuminating because without mentioning anything to do with all this, there are statistics quoted that are taken and used for here, but they don't necessarily represent the population here," Snyder said.

Some people also believe that sexual assault statistics are inaccurate because false reports are filed. In a recent letter from Christina Abdulghani regarding her son Tareq's accusation of sexual assault, she wrote, "In spite of studies that show that 50 percent of accusations of rape made on college campuses are false, there is no system to support the accused in such a situation."

According to a 1997 Columbia Journalism Review article, FBI statistics since 1991 have shown that the annual rate for false reporting of forcible sexual assault across the country has been a consistent 8 percent (through 1995). The author also notes that that number is four times higher than the average of false reporting rates of other crimes tracked by the FBI in its Uniform Crime Report.

Marrara does not think people lie about being sexually assaulted.

"When someone is sexually assaulted, it's true. Why would you want to create something like that in your head?" Marrara said.

University ignorant to needs of students

Throughout the past few weeks, sexual assault at the University has been brought to the forefront and has been the topic of much discussion and debate. This dialogue stemmed from a letter sent home to the parents of all male students by Christina Abdulghani, mother of expelled student Tareq Abdulghani, cautioning parents to warn their sons about the injustices in the University judicial system.

The letter has since incited fear in both male and female students at the University and exposed several weaknesses in the organization and specificity of the judicial process.

Now, men may not only fear that they will be the victims of a false sexual assault accusation, but the victims of a biased judicial board as well.

The letter also has effectively accused University women of arbitrarily charging men of committing sexual assault. Currently, more sexual assaults occur on campus than are reported. With the stigma that accusing someone of sexual assault may result in the survivor's accountability being questioned, more cases may tragically remain unreported.

Even the statistics of reported sexual assaults are somewhat of a mystery, both to obtain and understand. It took an experienced Bucknellian reporter two weeks to uncover sexual assault statistics for the University.

When the reporter finally did obtain these statistics, they were inconsistent and difficult to decipher. While the University may not purposely be making these numbers hard to research and comprehend, the difficulty encountered when trying to obtain such statistics is indicative of the overall lack of organization in which they are reported.

Considering that sexual assault statistics are grossly underestimated, how are students expected to have an accurate view of their security?

Yes, statistics are available on Public Safety's Web site, but students might question whether they are comprehensive reflections of the University community.

In addition, how are students expected to understand the judicial process that has been established to protect that security?

Very few students even keep their Student Handbooks, which outlines the judicial process, not to mention bother to carefully read it.

To further complicate the overall lack of knowledge regarding the judicial process, the sexual assault section of the Student Handbook is so ambiguous and unordered that a student trying to gain an understanding of his or her rights would be presented with a difficult task.

The focus of the support system is also biased in favor of the victim. For the victim, there are several sections that outline his or her judicial options and detail places to receive support.

For the accused, there are no such sections. In fact, until December 2002, there was not even a University advocate for the accused.

Several University men addressed the Bucknell Student Government two weeks ago requesting that changes be made to sexual assault proceedings. They requested that men be provided with a support system similar to the the women's resource center where they would all feel comfortable going, whether they are the victim of a sexual assault or the accused.

When a sexual assault occurs on campus, the comfort level of all students and the security of the entire community is jeopardized. Students should not feel that they live in an inhospitable environment that will cast judgment on them if they report a sexual assault or are accused of one.

Students have a right to know about sexual assault on campus and a right to know their options when a sexual assault occurs, and ignorance is never an option. By failing to fulfill its obligation to educate students about the statistics, judicial procedure and advisory options available in sexual assault cases, the University is exhibiting and advocating an attitude of ignorance and indifference to the needs of students.

Heiter Community Center thanks SAE

To the Editor:

Speaking as the President of the Board of the Donald Heiter Community Center, I wish to express to the members of the Sigma Alpha Epsilon (SAE) Fraternity of Bucknell University deep and heartfelt appreciation for a job not only well done, but well done with enthusiasm and style. The fifth annual Chocolate Lover' Fantasy Festival, held at the Street of Shops on Feb. 1, was a great success.

The efforts of the young men of SAE helped raise more than $6,000 in support of the event. They worked without stint from 10 a.m. to well past midnight in all aspects of setup, support, serving and cleanup for this fundraiser event. They provide a superb example of the many positive efforts by University students in support of the Lewisburg community, and they deserve our sincere praise and gratitude.

Sincerely,
Jane Amacher

Professor's statement at forum offends student

To the Editor:

I am writing to voice my disgust over Professor Hilbourne Watson's characterization of Secretary of State Colin Powell as a "slave" to his "master" President Bush during the recent campus forum on Iraq (2/13). When Secretary Powell presented the evidence against Iraq before the United Nations, he did so in good conscience. What would he have to gain as Bush's "slave"?

Several opinion polls prior to the 2000 election positioned Powell as a powerful presidential candidate, should he have chosen to run. He already had the opportunity to run for president (really the only position above his own) if he wished, so why would he docilely do Bush's bidding?

Watson's words are racist, pure and simple. Would he have used the same characterization if a black secretary of state working in the Clinton Administration were to present the same evidence? I think not.

Disagreeing with the actions of a public figure is one thing, but then lowering the dialogue to racial epithets is quite another. Diversity of thought needs to be respected just as much as diversity of racial and cultural background. Professor Watson's comments were irresponsible, and not at the standard required of a Bucknell faculty member.

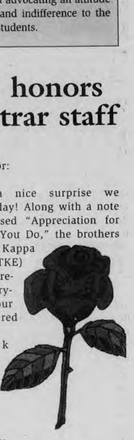
I hope that the presenters in forthcoming forums are more carefully chosen.

Sincerely,
Brian Bialas '04

TKE honors registrar staff

To the Editor:

What a nice surprise we received today! Along with a note that expressed "Appreciation for Everything You Do," the brothers of Tau Kappa Epsilon (TKE) Fraternity presented everyone in our office with red carnations.



Thank you TKE for thinking of us. It made our day!

University fines extract more student money

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

So, a mother goes downstairs into her son's room and observes that he is legally drinking, but in a manner which she disfavors—perhaps a game of quarters. She then reprimands him. She informs him that he is no longer allowed to move from the house next year (even though he is 21), he must move into the better room he was promised for next year, he must attend counseling, write an essay to his father, relinquish his driving privileges, perform 20 hours of community service and she is going to tell his mean uncle about this. He thinks the worst is over, but then she demands he pay her $200. Lastly, if he does it again, he's kicked out.

This probably wouldn't be considered the functioning of a normal family. But it is the functioning of what University President Steffen Rogers likes to call, "the Bucknell Family." If you like paying fines, then it's a good thing you're enrolled here.

I sent an e-mail to my fraternity and some other friends, asking if they knew some egregious examples of ways in which the administration taps into our wallets—and while we all know our school robs us blind at every opportunity it gets, I wasn't prepared for the huge quantity of responses I received. People were clearly upset; several unprintable comments were made in reference to our school.

The judicial system received many complaints. Most said that it seemed unnecessary to punish students in a variety of ways, for small things, only to slap a fat fine on at the end. Also, many protested what they viewed as "double jeopardy." When students get in trouble downtown, they deal with the Lewisburg authorities and pay their due. Incomprehensibly, the administration then seeks to profit off the student's misfortune.

"When I was caught downtown with an open container, Bucknell gave me two more points, and fined me $150 as well. It wasn't even on their property," Sean Murphy '03 wrote. "I only had to pay Lewisburg $100."

"My brother went abroad to Gallway, Ireland," Rob Defina '04 wrote. "It only cost $7,000 for the semester. Bucknell forced him to pay an extra $5,000 or they wouldn't accept his credits. The $5,000 my parents were forced to pay received no service in return."

You would think it would be relatively cheap to go to school in the middle of nowhere, live in a small dorm room and eat in a cafeteria. But surprisingly, it seems universally to be the case that flying off to a foreign country, renting an apartment and taking classes overseas costs about half of what it does to go here. Unfortunately, the administration sees to it that no money is saved by students or their parents.

Parking was an issue that generated much attention. There is a huge empty lot behind Fraternity Road that is left empty day in and day out. Unfortunately, students are not permitted to park there.

Citing a lack of available spaces, students protested what they saw as ridiculously high-priced parking tickets. After just one ticket, students can begin incurring $100 tickets for subsequent violations.

Not one city I have ever visited in the entire world has even come close to have parking tickets this high—and this coming from a place where students can only afford $1 beers. Apparently, the University often rakes in upwards of $100,000 a year in parking fines. And we aren't even that big of a school!

Housing was another situation that created distress.

"This year, Hunt and Vedder Halls were renovated," Zerai Hagos '03 wrote. "Instead of allowing more students to live off-campus to accommodate this, they allowed even less." The "Mods" were, surprisingly, originally designed as doubles, but then turned into rooms for five. Singles were turned into doubles. And empty houses remained downtown.

The Greek system also provides a good revenue source for our administration. It is estimated that the school receives close to $100,000 a year through fining various fraternities and sororities.

There was also much anger over meal plans. Last semester, when Greek pledges were supposed to have their meal plans turned over to their respective houses, the administration repeatedly refused to do this. Aside from altering pledge programs, the inaction left almost every fraternity with a financial burden.

The C-Store, it was observed, also charges about 20 percent more on products than do stores in the surrounding area. Each meal credit sells for $7.05, and can then be redeemed for $2.50 during breakfast and $3 and change during lunch. A standard sandwich and beverage costs more than the meal credit allotment.

> Not one city I have ever visited in the entire world has even come close to have parking tickets this high—and this coming from a place where students can only afford $1 beers. Apparently, the University often rakes in upwards of $100,000 a year in parking fines. And we aren't even that big of a school!

"I, as well as every other freshman here, pay for 19 meals a week. Not only do I not eat that many meals in the cafeteria each week, but they are only good for certain windows of time after which they simply disappear," Nate Sartell '06 wrote. "Also, the Bison is a big-time rip-off. Our meal credit is supposedly worth over $7 for dinner in the caf, but only $4.45 for dinner in the Bison. It's nice how a lot of things in the Bison cost over $4.45 so they get our meal credit plus a few cents extra each time."

And yet, there were more.

"Last semester I only needed one credit to graduate," Adam Levine '02 wrote. "By living off-campus and paying for the one credit, I would have paid about $1,500, but they instead forced me to take at least three credits so they could get the $15,000 from me."

"Fines for damages to residence halls I did not commit? How petty is that, asking for an extra $23.44 on top of $30,000? Please, unless I started a fire, take it out of tuition," Matt Del Giudice '03 wrote.

"I was supposed to give Bucknell a meningitis form before enrollment, but I had already given them my medical information, which included the shot. I handed in the new form a day late; they charged me $25," Defina wrote.

"I don't see why they expect us to donate after this highway robbery," Adam Zivich '03 wrote.

There were actually several other things people were upset about, but lack of space prohibits me from addressing them.

What's most bothering is that many simply cannot afford attending school here. For the last three years, I have tried unsuccessfully to get a job on campus. When I've asked whether I could repay my debts to the school through more positive and constructive methods—such as community service, manual labor, driving a safe ride taxi, etc.—I've been met with the same response each time: "No, we want the money."

Perhaps most ironic, is that our education's price tag has just jumped to an astronomical rate of over $35,000, $28,764 of which is for tuition. With the exception of hard science, management and art majors, I would say the rest of us arts and science folk are experiencing a monumental rip-off.

If I were to put a price tag on the education I have received here, it wouldn't even approach the almost eighth of a million it actually costs.

And with the recent study the Bucknell University Conservatives Club published in the current edition of The Counterweight—which confirms a blatant liberal leaning of our faculty—it's truly upsetting that I have only had one professor in four years who wasn't a leftist.

$35,262.00? And they wonder why the student body is so homogenous.

Would "women-only spaces" be productive?

By Phil Martoma
Senior Writer

In our country it is usually unpopular to defend any form of mandatory exclusivity. With regards to many historically oppressed minorities, it was very popular to challenge many old traditions of exclusivity because the people of the United States desire to be an inclusive community. This community judges people based on their individual contributions, rather than any particular external qualities they possess. Thus, when the issue of a women-only space is brought to our attention, many people naturally react with a sentiment of immediate animosity, as if such a suggestion were to somehow recreate the very challenges based on gender that the women's liberation movement sought to end.

However, when we analyze the nature of what is actually occurring, we find a different trend arising. We cannot analyze the value of a women-only space without first discussing the power relations that already exist in society and how they shape the manner with which an individual relates to the rest of their society. I personally believe, and this comes mostly from personal observations, that women are not as empowered as are men with regards to many aspects of life.

One such way in which women are not as empowered is with regard to the inequality in time they spend talking in the classroom. Since we are in a University setting, I feel I should focus on this particular issue. Last year, after reading about the disproportionate amount of time that female students spend talking to their professors in the classroom, I decided to do an experiment of sorts. I sat quietly and did not talk in a particular class and observed how often the students would make a comment, and tally only those comments that were longer than two or three word responses. My class was made up of seven men and three women, excluding myself, and I tallied them on three occasions throughout that semester. I found that the women made three comments, while the males made about 30. I realized then that many of the trends brought up by the articles I read seemed to be supported by these observations. I noticed that many times the women spoke, it was only when solicited by the professor, and for whatever reason, these particular students did not feel as comfortable speaking up in class as did their male counterparts.

One such conclusion many people might turn to would be segregating the sexes, although, this is not what I am suggesting. Instead, if for whatever reason, females are not as empowered as men with regards to voicing their opinions, or other aspects of our lives, then there is nothing wrong with trying to create "women-only spaces," from which they can shelter themselves from the forces that are disadvantaging them.

War is illogical. Weapons of mass destruction are harmful. Violence is shameful, and so is sexual assault. Yet each is a manifestation of our power structure—our politics, government, corporations, economics and social life are indeed dominated by humans of the male persuasion.

It is therefore easy to jump to the conclusion that men are inherently inclined to this sort of behavior, without exception, worldwide. But with such a jump you would plummet into the deep logical pitfalls of second-wave feminism, popularized in the 1970s, a dualistic ideology that is both problematic and self-defeating. This perpetuation of the dualism between men and women is indeed the perpetuation of the very same problematic and hierarchical power relationships that a feminist wishes to dismantle.

The concept of "women-only spaces" establishes similar boundaries based on the gender phenotype. Advocates argue for certain spaces or events to be deemed "women only," and some were further displeased by the addition of a male monologue to the recent (and fantastic) production of "The Vagina Monologues" (bravo to Valerie Lam '04 and V-Day Bucknell).

As a longtime devout and outspoken feminist, I am confused by such arguments because indeed one must posit a distinction between the male and female in relation to misogyny and feminism as unique subsets of values. Those characteristics or attitudes that allow sexual assault, rape or sexism to occur are not inherited from biological gender, but instead socialized power hierarchies in a society, often based on gender.

The dualistic interpretation of gender identity and "women-only spaces" is therefore self-defeating and essentialist. To argue that a place belongs to one gender and not the other is the same sort of argument right-wing ideologues such as Jesse Helms have consistently set forth. Do women belong in the kitchen? Of course not. The kitchen is no more a "female" place than it is a "male" place. Excluding men who may even be devout feminists is counterproductive and counterintuitive—it is not biology that allows for such horrible tragedies like sexual assault, but a socialized attitude.

Empowerment of the female gender as we interpret it must come by combating the attitudes that allow for women to be thought of on a lower order of existence.

I am arguing against "women-only spaces" in favor of a broader definition and interpretation of the cause of sexual violence and sexism. I am arguing instead for "feminist-only spaces," including many anatomically male who combat the attitudes that facilitate female disempowerment.

"Women-only spaces" build walls, not bridges. The concept perpetuates the notion of an underlying antagonism between the genders, which is indeed the root of the problem in and of itself. The solution, instead, is to tear down the social barriers of the hierarchy in order to forge a new, egalitarian sets of values and relationships.

What men can do to prevent sexual assault and to support victims on campus

By Peter Hackeman

Unlike cereal from the caf or the last exam of the semester, responsibility is not something college students like to take. College is the last few years before we begin our responsibility-filled adult lives—60- and 70-hour workweeks, HMOs, 401Ks, mortgages and children can wait. We are young enough to enjoy today while knowing our talents and drive will ensure our success tomorrow.

When it comes to sexual assault, we need to take responsibility now. While sexual assault victimizes both genders, and without comparing the gravity of assaults against men to those against women, the vast majority of sexual assaults on this campus are perpetrated by men against women. This fact reflects poorly on all men on this campus. Every assault on a woman does more damage to our community and to the victim than many of us realize.

What makes this situation so unfortunate is that most men would never think of assaulting a woman. While there's nothing embarrassing with just worrying about our own actions and ourselves, we can and should do more. I'm hoping to reach some of those responsible men and share with them some things we can do to make our campus safer and more compassionate.

We shouldn't just take responsibility for our own actions; we should take pride in our school, our dorms, our houses, our gender. That means stopping sexual assault from happening whenever we see signs that it may be about to occur.

We all know the difference between a couple of people out to have a good time one weekend evening and a girl too intoxicated to walk, stand or talk being sexually assaulted. And that's what it's called in such a case; she's not just being taken advantage of, she's being assaulted. Guys, imagine the girl under assault was your sister, your girlfriend or your daughter. Then how would you feel? Would you do something to stop it? Do some brother, some guy, some father who you don't know a favor and intervene.

I'm not trying to claim that all or even most sexual assaults occur to drunk girls at weekend parties. This is simply one obvious example of a situation that almost all of us can relate to and that any of us could do something about. Unfortunately, some sexual assaults occur in ways that can't be prevented by vigilant members of the community. In these cases, we should do more to provide comfort, counseling and other necessary resources to the victims of sexual assault.

There are many groups on campus that devote time, energy and money to supporting women's issues. They should be commended for their efforts. One such group has met with controversy over the way it goes about raising money for this cause.

"The Vagina Monologues," a play put on by V-Day Bucknell, has become a firestorm of controversy. Detractors claim that the play is vulgar and doesn't address sexual assault directly. They claim that the play promotes a man-hating point of view by only portraying men in negative lights. Unfortunately for them, most of these critics have never read Eve Ensler's book or seen the play. Their opinions are based on other people's interpretations and gossip.

While I, and the vast majority of people who actually saw the play, have a very different opinion of it, the critics could do one of a couple of things to gain credibility in this discussion. These critics could try to read the book or even see the play once before posing as experts on its message. If they can't bring themselves to do that, then they should at least make a donation of $6 to V-Day Bucknell or directly to Susquehanna Valley Women in Transition. Next year, they could buy a ticket to the performance and then refuse to go. This way they are both helping the cause, one that I doubt anyone could be against, and also protesting the manner of fundraising.

In fact, if these critics wanted to impress everyone, they could spend months preparing a play or some other function of their liking. Have a play about former President Ronald Reagan, Barry Goldwater or about some wrongs they want to see righted in the world; put on a play that gives voice to victims of high taxes and government handouts. Do something proactive to help prevent sexual assault, like becoming a member of the One in Four group. We are all smart and energetic enough to do more than just complain.

It's up to the men on this campus who are concerned enough about this problem to do something about it. While, as men, many of us will never be able to sympathize with women who are sexually assaulted, we can do more to empathize and to help them deal with the traumatic experience.

The bottom line here is that sexual assault is a horribly traumatic crime that we can all help prevent. It's an offense against our society and our community when we decide to ignore this crime. Further, it's indefensible that more of us don't do more to provide assistance to the victims of this assault.

The unfortunate truth is that most of us won't fully comprehend these truths until someone we are close to is sexually assaulted. We may only realize the depth of this problem when it's too late to prevent this atrocity from happening to our sisters, daughters or best friends. Demand that other men join you in making a difference for a woman you might not know. Be chivalrous and look out for women you don't know, because someone cares about them, too.

Protesters fail to grasp reason for Iraqi war

By Aaron Hanlon
Senior Writer

The antiwar eccentrics strewn over college campuses and Workers' World Party "peace" protests are giving the non-partisan notion of pacifism a bad name. Donning Che Guevara banners and carrying signs with such moronic messages as "No War For Oil" and "Bush Is Hitler," these radical ideologues seem more interested in condemning America than fighting for peace.

War is not easy to support. The idea that disputes can, or in some cases seemingly must, be resolved by violence can be awfully tough to swallow for both pacifists and warhawks alike. This is the case because there are plenty of valid, logical reasons to oppose war of any kind. The Judeo-Christian ethos in its broadest and most secular sense teaches us not to kill or inflict harm on our neighbors. War inevitably leads to death and destruction. And to what end? None of us can even be certain that our good intentions in fighting a war as a "necessary evil" will come to fruition. To approach a potential war situation without healthy skepticism for the very idea of war would be irrational at best and inhuman at worst. That being said, there are frankly few arguments more easily made than opposition to war. In spite of this, many of those opposed to war in Iraq have bypassed the most valid and convincing reasons for opposition in favor of anti-American cheap shots that are no less blasphemous and idiotic than they are false and misleading.

The so-called "Bush's War" in Iraq is not a neo-imperialist crusade resulting from the whim of a neo-fascist dictator. With a majority of Americans and American policymakers in the most legitimate and time-tested democratic republic in the history of the world in support of the war in Iraq, we are hardly being blindfolded and led down the path of treachery that Hitler blazed years ago. Many honest Americans have honest desires to protect our country. The arrogant assumption that we are all being duped into war by Herr Bush and his neo-fascist propagandists is far-fetched and outright insulting to the average American. Let us not forget that, excluding the USA Patriot Act, the most egregious human rights violations are being committed not by the Bush administration and the United States, but by Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's brutal regime; the same brutal regime that is responsible for torture and murder en masse. Yet, rather than opposing war for the purpose of achieving peace, many are overlooking the atrocities of Hussein's dictatorship to slander our president. It is arguable whether or not there could ever be another Hitler; another human being with such a combination of evil, insanity and manipulative ability. To assert that Bush is the next Hitler, while in the company of the reprehensible, Hussein is disgusting.

The suggestion that America is leaning toward war in Iraq for oil interests is equally unfounded and imbecile. Were America to come close to conquering Hussein's regime, common knowledge indicates that he would likely set his oil fields afire. Even after America spends billions of dollars to put out fires and make repairs, the payoff is far from certain. We have yet to reap the supposed economic benefits of liberating Kuwait in the early 1990s. This is the case because many of the regimes in the Middle East, liberated or not, depend on oil revenues. Many, like Kuwait, simply cannot afford to break with OPEC in order to show us gratitude. Conquering Iraq and setting up a democratic government there is not necessarily going to guarantee economic favors. In addition to this, America is in no way dependent upon the Middle East and OPEC for oil. According to the American Petroleum Institute, the United States gets only 13 percent of its oil from the Middle East, and an almost negligible 3 percent from Iraq. Are we going to fight a $50 billion war over 3 percent of our oil imports? Clearly, the suggestion that America is fighting a war for oil interests is unfounded and flat-out illogical. If anyone is viewing war in Iraq from an economic standpoint, it is surely our pseudo-allies in France and Germany, both of whom have been the beneficiaries of remunerative oil contracts with Iraq while simultaneously questioning America's motives.

There is certainly nothing ignoble about opposing war. Even in our most desperate times war is an unattractive option, and in some cases arguably an unattractive necessity. But criticism of war in Iraq, now our country's most demanding policy issue, should be well-thought-out and rooted in fact and logic. The ridiculous claims that we are considering risking human lives in Iraq for economic or undemocratic reasons suggests something deeper than pacifism. Those who perpetuate this anti-American propaganda are lucid examples, perhaps unwittingly, of the sort of hatred that is far more culpable for dividing the world than an impending American war against a brutal dictator in Iraq.

Letter distorts University women

By Katie Parker
Senior Writer

To all Bucknell male students: Women are not rape-criers.

A recent letter sent to the parents of all male students at the University by Christina Abdulghani would have you believe so. Ms. Abdulghani sent this letter in defense of her son, Tareq, after he was expelled from the University, having been found responsible for charges of sexual assault brought against him by a female student. Although you can certainly understand Ms. Abdulghani's desire to protect her son from what she feels to be an unfair and biased judicial process, you must question whether or not this letter was the way to do so. In the letter, Ms. Abdulghani states, "I want to make it clear that I am not writing this letter as an action against the women at Bucknell." I disagree, and further make the claim that even if Ms. Abdulghani did not mean for this letter to be an action against female students of the University, it is exactly that. This letter has done irreparable harm to the women of this campus, especially those who have been or will be the victims of sexual assault.

First of all, Ms. Abdulghani does not name the female student whom she is accusing of pressing false charges in this letter. Although certainly this is to the benefit of the woman who had to face these ungrounded accusations from the parent of her perpetrator, this namelessness allows these charges to extend to all the women of the University. In the eyes of our community (aside from the few members who are privy to information released in the trial), any female student on this campus could have been the woman who pressed these charges. Although Ms. Abdulghani states several times in her letter that she is mostly concerned with the inherent flaws in the University's judicial system, she also presses the point several times that the charges brought against her son are absolutely false. The implication is, of course, that the female student has lied. Her lack of specifics insinuates that any female student in the campus community could have been capable of the false accusations that led to her son's expulsion.

Her Web site takes this matter further. A link off of her Web site asks the question, "What are these girls thinking?" Clicking on the link leads to an article entitled "The Girl Who Cried Wolf." I suppose Ms. Abdulghani felt that on her Web site, she could get away with overtly and directly calling girls who report questionable sexual assaults "liars." Ideally, all sexual assaults would be clear-cut, but Ms. Abdulghani seems to think that if the accuser does not provide a videotaped confession along with semen samples and fingerprints, she's obviously lying. Not an action against women, indeed. False accusations of rape are a serious matter. They are terrifying, not only for the person being accused, but for any member of a community who supports a safe, comfortable, receptive environment where sexual assault victims feel secure enough to bring charges against their perpetrators. Sexual assault is a particularly problematic crime—it can look consensual, the physical evidence can be minimal and the survivor may not even remember her assault. These extenuating circumstances create a Catch-22 for the legal system (and for the University's judicial board). This controversial trend towards judicial lenience makes it less intimidating and more convincing to report an assault. It also opens up the possibility of false convictions based on minimal emphasis of physical evidence.

We want a community that will provide a safe environment for women. Ms. Abdulghani's letter constructs a community that is distrustful of women, and even biased against them. Although she aligns herself with feminism (both "literally and figuratively"), her letter nullifies and discounts several important steps that have raised sexual assault awareness (and thus increased awareness of women's rights issues) on this campus. She makes the claim that the University wants to "protect a system that probably gets them points at any politically correct conference they attend," reducing a judicial system, based upon a recognition of an increased risk of sexual assault on college campuses, to a strategic ploy by the University to present itself in a more PC-friendly light. She also argues that "declaring an event happened more than three weeks later cannot be the rule for assuming sexual assault." Ms. Abdulghani, despite the wealth of sexual assault knowledge she says she has taught her daughter, obviously has never heard of rape trauma syndrome, in which the survivor may feel disoriented, afraid and even hide the fact that she has been assaulted for a long period of time. This is not to mention Ms. Abdulghani's choice to include well-disputed statistics or her thoughtless endorsement of polygraph results in this case. For those of you who think the polygraph should be admitted, think about this—if Tareq doesn't think he raped this student, then obviously he will pass a polygraph. Do we want our community to be made up of people whose attitudes are so skewed towards women that they don't even know if they've committed rape? Ignorance should not be a valid defense in this case.

Ms. Abdulghani said in her letter that "Bucknell is far more concerned with what is comfortable than with what is true." What is "comfortable"? Is "comfortable" telling a roomful of strangers that you were held down by a man and forced to engage in a sexual act? Is "comfortable" knowing that your story has been spread to every parent of a male student on this campus? Is "comfortable" being called a liar, being accused of crying rape, being accused of needing attention? Is "comfortable" being another woman, now scared to come forward because of what may be sent home about her? No, Ms. Abdulghani, we are not more concerned with what is "comfortable." We are concerned with providing an environment where women feel safe reporting any assault they encounter, without having to worry about attacks from people like you.

People across the globe protest war with Iraq

Antiwar protesters gathered last Saturday in Hyde Park in London, in the biggest demonstration in British history, against a U.S.-led war against Iraq. Hundreds of thousands of protesters in London joined millions of protesters across the globe in the largest antiwar protests since the Vietnam War.

Protesters gathered in New York City and scores of other cities across the United States, Europe and Asia on Saturday to peacefully demonstrate against the Bush administration's planned military invasion of Iraq.

The New York Times reported that the crowds in New York represented a "broad new antiwar movement," which condemned U.S. President George W. Bush's eagerness for war, while denying any form of sympathy for Iraqi President Saddam Hussein and his dictatorial government. They also criticized Bush's so-called obsession with his father's Persian Gulf War in 1991 and its failure to overthrow Hussein.

Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and Secretary of State Colin Powell were also targets for denunciation.

Many demonstrators agreed that Hussein should not be permitted to possess weapons of mass destruction, but that preemptive military strikes were immoral and would harm the domestic economy. They would also deepen already-noticeable divisions between the United States and the Arab world and further undermine fragile American alliances in Europe and Asia.

"We see the war against Iraq as unjust. We don't believe Bush's rhetoric. I think he's not acting in the best interest of the American people. We're risking the lives of hundreds of American soldiers and an untold number of lives in the Middle East, and a war will not solve the problem of terrorism. It disgusts me. I can't accept that," said Angela Tsang, 21, a Barnard College student who was part of the Columbia University Antiwar Coalition, in Amsterdam, Brussels, Barcelona, Rome, Melbourne, Cape Town, Johannesburg, Auckland, Seoul, Tokyo and Manila. Many of the demonstrators insisted that the United States' interest in Iraq centers not on disarming Hussein, but on its need for oil.

"Bush will never admit it, but I know this war is about the oil because you look in the paper and you read about North Korea conducting nuclear testing, and Bush doesn't seem too worried bout that," said William Bazot, a 36-year-old Parisian holding his infant boy, who wore a cardboard sign declaring "No to the War," The New York Times reported.

As protests unfolded in more than 350 cities around the world, few violent incidents were reported, according to The New York Times. The police in Athens released tear gas and fought with demonstrators who threw rocks and gasoline bombs. No serious injuries were recorded.

The New York Times reported that organizers labeled this demonstration the "largest and most diverse peace protest since the Vietnam War." It was "the culmination of a global campaign that has been building for weeks in opposition to the growing threat of war, with thousands marching, rallying, signing petitions, raising money, publishing articles and using the Internet to enlist a diverse coalition of citizens and celebrities," including Nobel Peace Prize winner Archbishop Desmond Tutu of South Africa, folk singer Pete Seeger and actors Danny Glover, Susan Sarandon and Harry Belafonte.

People from varying political, social and economic backgrounds participated in the protests—college students, middle-aged couples, families with small children, veterans of the civil rights and antiwar movement of the 1960s and groups representing labor, environmental, religious, business and civic organizations.

According to CNN.com, film director Rob Reiner said in Los Angeles, "This is the greatest support we could ever give to our troops because what we are trying to do is protect them from going into harm's way needlessly. There is no God-awful reason to go to war at this moment. There is no reason to rush into this war, and what we are trying to do is protect our troops from sending them into harm's way."

The White House responded to the demands of the demonstrators by asserting that Bush is still hoping for a peaceful disarmament of the Iraqi government and views force only as a last resort, according to CNN.com.

Millions march for peace

❖ Commentary

An estimated 13 million people around the world gathered to voice their opposition to the war on Iraq last Saturday. In Rome, London, Seoul, Tel Aviv, New York, Los Angeles and over 600 cities spanning every continent, huge marches demonstrated growing resistance to U.S. President George W. Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair coalition's desire to test the unprecedented doctrine of preemptive war. The marches, organized largely via the Internet, unified a diverse array of groups with a common desire for a more peaceful world.

I was in New York City to participate in the rally at Dag Hammerskjold Plaza. As someone who believes that America's current foreign policy is leading the world farther from peace, not towards it, I have been against the war on Iraq from day one. But it was not until I saw the hundreds of thousands of like-minded people crowding into the streets of Manhattan that I first believed war might not be inevitable. The energy was thick with hope as people carried banners of all types, beat drums and engaged in creative direct action. Many carried signs reading slogans such as, "War orphans make the best terrorists," and "How many lives per gallon does your car get?"

When New York City deployed thousands of police to engage in complicated and often violent crowd control, keeping many from the actual staging area, people chanted "Whose streets? Our streets," refusing to let their spirits be dampened. After making it through the maze of streets that the NYPD had closed off and seeing Archbishop Desmond Tutu and others speak for peace, I joined an impromptu march to Central Park with a group of street performers from Vermont who had made hundreds of puppets representing the innocent and faceless people that will die as a result of a U.S.-led war on Iraq.

Despite the growing opposition to the war, American politicians remain essentially silent, maintaining their rubber-stamp mentality for Bush's pro-war agenda. On Feb. 12, Senator Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., said in a speech before the U.S. Senate, "This Chamber is, for the most part, silent—ominously, dreadfully silent. There is no debate, no discussion, no attempt to lay out for the nation the pros and cons of this particular war. There is nothing."

While our leaders have been silent, the people have not. More marches are being planned all over the country and the world. A convergence on the White House has been announced for March 1.

> We must make every possible step toward peace. Bush has done the opposite, arguing and preparing for war from the beginning. It is time for the people of the world to demand peace with one collective voice.

I met people on the train into New York that were collecting money to send Reverend Fredrick Boyle of Randolph, N.J., and hundreds of others to Baghdad to act as human shields. Such utter devotion to the human family gives me hope that the people of the world can convince Bush to end his drive to war. Human society stands on the precipice of a war that could very well lead to terrible and unimaginable consequences. We must make every possible step towards peace. Bush has done the opposite, arguing and preparing for war from the beginning.

It is time for the people of the world to demand peace with one collective voice. We must not let our leaders convince us with meager evidence and propaganda that war is necessary. Peace is the answer our society seeks, whether we know it or not. But going to war with Iraq will not achieve peace—only more fear, hatred and violence. So if you are a human of conscience who cares for this planet and the future of its inhabitants, say "No" to war on Iraq.

Retailers blanketed with snowfall

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

It started falling Sunday afternoon while the Bison were finishing off the Midshipmen in Sojka Pavilion on ESPN2. It continued through the night and left us with a thick blanket of fluffy, white snow, which was enough to allow students a rare day off from classes at the University. Around the Northeast, people were staying home instead of doing just what businesses need—shopping at the President's Day sales.

Department stores and other retailers up and down the East Coast spent the past several weeks advertising their sales in newspapers and on television. The crippling snowfalls that were seen across the region forced most stores to remain closed on Monday, with public officials asking motorists to stay off the roads.

The chairman of Boscov's, Albert Boscov, said Monday on MSNBC.com that he was contemplating running his sale on Saturday due to a lost day of sales throughout his mid-Atlantic base. Saturday is George Washington's actual birthday and this would make the sale even more of a President's Day sale.

"In comparison to Christmas, it's not a big deal," Boscov said.

Wal-Mart was forced to close many of its stores in nine states along the East Coast. Tim Williams, a spokesman for the company, told MSNBC.com that the revenue could be made up fairly quickly if the store is stocked when it reopens following the weather closing.

"The key thing is to be ready when they do come," Williams said. "You only sell what's on your shelves."

"A storm at this time is the worst thing that could happen to retailers," said C. Britt Beemer, chairman of America's Research Group, according to MSNBC.com. "It is a big loss to sales. Whether a store is open or not, consumers are not going to risk injury to go out shopping."

The region around Washington, D.C., was hardest hit and retailers there will feel the effects of the storm the most. The city received more than two feet of snow and its roads were closed in most places.

The Washington Post reported the widespread closings in the area. Hecht's was offering more than 60 percent off its winter merchandise that was still available on store shelves. An automobile dealership, Landmark Honda, "was looking to meet or beat the 25 to 30 cars it normally sells on President's Day, one of the biggest sales days of the year." In addition, US Airways saw its plans for a strong weekend of travel grounded, along with many of its planes, in the Northeast.

All this snow is just adding to the headaches being felt generally by retailers and businesses. The massive uncertainty gripping the nation regarding the possibility of war in Iraq, problems with North Korea, a rift with NATO and the European Union and the continuing fear over a possible attack by al-Qaida are all creating a terrible environment for business. Consumers are not spending the same amount of money they used to simply because they do not know what is going to happen.

Frank Badillo, a senior economist with Retail Forward, told CNN that a coming war could bring a sustained period of weakness to the retail market.

"When you look back to [the last Iraq war in] 1991, when the shooting started it definitely caused a weak period to become even weaker. Once the tide turned very quickly in favor of the United States, there was a big bounce-back in consumer confidence, but it turned out to be very fleeting because the underlying fundamentals weren't strong enough to carry a rebound," Badillo said.

"If things go well and these [war] issues resolve by midyear, there's a chance for a modest rebound developing in the second half of the year," Badillo said. This is due to the fundamentals looking much stronger this time.

Courtesy of Reuters

A cross-country skier passes through Times Square in New York City. Forecasters predicted 18-22 inches of snow from a storm that rocked the Northeast and forced many already stressed businesses to close.

Some businesses are laughing at this snow all the way to the bank. The rock salt business is booming as many cities are spending more on snow control this year than in most. Plow operators are also making more money. In addition, ski-mountain operators in most areas of the Northeast are having their best winter in years.

Deep snowdrifts may not seem like a major concern to businesses, especially in the face of turmoil around the world and fears of terrorism at home. The snow is serious business and it will have noticeable effects on the economy.

MacGyver named to Department of Homeland Security?

Women snap three-game losing streak

With the win over the Midshipmen, the Bison improve to 10-12 overall and 5-5 in the Patriot League

By Joe Schweitzer
Staff Writer

The Bucknell women's basketball squad used an outstanding team effort to defeat Navy 73-60 on Feb. 16. The 10-12 Bison snapped a three-game losing streak and improved to 5-5 in league play, moving into sole possession of 4th place in the conference.

The Orange and Blue returned to Sojka Pavilion for the first time in two weeks and were greeted by a regional ESPN2 audience, a rowdy home crowd and many members of last year's championship team. The Bison felt the love and responded with one of their best team efforts of the season as they turned back the clocks to their championship play of last season.

"It was great having them [seniors from last year's team] back here," All-Patriot League candidate Desire Almind '04 said. "We really wanted to show them that the tradition was still alive and well this season."

The Lady Bison erased all doubts in the opening minutes by displaying an impressive zone defense that confused and frustrated Navy. Molly Creamer '03 set the tone for the game by using her overlooked playmaking ability. The nation's leading scorer only attempted one shot in the first 10 minutes of play, but dazzled the crowd and Navy defenders with outstanding behind-the-back dribbling and crisp passes that set up her teammates for easy scores. Creamer threw a skip pass to an open Kate Franks '03, who knocked down a three-pointer to ignite a key surge. The Orange and Blue run included a Creamer dish to Lindsey Geosits '06 for an open trey and four points from Almind to send the Bison to a 22-12 lead with under 10 minutes in the half.

Molly Creamer '03 gets jostled around in a sea of players during last Sunday's game against Navy, which was televised regionally and nationally on ESPN2. Creamer and the Bison put on an impressive show for the cameras, defeating Patriot League foe Navy 73-60 at Sojka Pavilion.

Almind and Geosits each went to the bench after being whistled for their second personal fouls and Navy took advantage by closing within one, 22-21. Almind returned and impacted the game immediately by snatching her eighth rebound and making a pass to Jennie Ruth '06 for a layup. Creamer then caught fire and scored 5 of her 10 first half points in a one-minute span to give Bucknell a 34-29 halftime edge. The Bison were focused and playing hard with neither trait being a coincidence.

"Molly and Kate had a meeting with the team this week to talk about the need for the squad to raise their level of play," Head Coach Kathy Fedorjaka said. "I had been trying to preach to everyone that we needed to step up, too, but Molly is a quiet kid, so when she talks people take notice and listen."

Navy started the second half trying to slow down the pace of the game as they pounded the ball inside, taking advantage of the youthful Bison interior and pulling within four, 38-34. Creamer again ignited another Bucknell run with her passing, finding Franks, who drained another from downtown. Navy responded by netting two

Bison travel to Chapel Hill to take on 9th ranked North Carolina

By Pat Evans
Sports Editor

The men's lacrosse team's quest to hold the Patriot League crown for a fourth straight year begins this Saturday when the 24th-ranked Bison travel to Chapel Hill where they will take on 9th-ranked North Carolina. The Bison will look to avenge last year's 12-3 loss against the Tar Heels.

This year seems as good as any for the Herd to knock off North Carolina and gain the national respect that they believe they deserve. The Bison return all but one starter this spring and are led by eight seniors who have all had significant experience throughout their careers.

"We're the same team as last year except we've got one more year of experience," co-captain goalie Justin Sussman '03 said. "We've got a fire in our belly and want to start our season off with a bang."

The Bison will be helped by sorely-missed midfielder John Terracciano '03 and attack Wes Fetchet '04, who were both out with knee injuries last season. Terracciano tallied eight goals and eight assists his junior year and Fetchet was the Patriot League's Rookie of the Year his first season.

Also fueling the offense will be Dennis Geraghty '03, co-captain Andrew Sanders '03 and Chris Cara '05, all of whom had outstanding 2002 campaigns. Geraghty's second straight 30-goal season earned him a spot on the Patriot League first team and his second consecutive selection on the preseason All-America team. Sanders tallied 13 goals and 16 assists last year and Cara shattered the University first-year student scoring record while ranking 5th nationally in goals and 6th in assists.

> "We're the same team as last year except we've got one more year of experience. We've got a fire in our belly and want to start our season off with a bang."
> —Justin Sussman '03

The offense hopes it can do better than last year's somewhat dismal performance and start the season off on a higher note.

"We've got a lot of returning guys," Cara said. "Last year we really didn't play up to our expectations, but this year I really think we've got more experience and we're ready to come out and play."

While the Bison are optimistic about their chances this weekend, the team recognizes that North Carolina isn't going to roll over for anybody on their own field. The Tar Heels have a highly powerful offense that returns its top five scorers, while boasting four preseason All-America selections.

"They're a lot like us in terms of who they've got coming back," Head Coach Sid Jamieson said. "It's great to open up against a team like this; we always want to play against the best guys."

The Bison got some experience playing against competition of national quality this preseason when they faced off against Towson, which is ranked 13th in the country. Although the teams don't keep a running score in the preseason, the Bison feel that they did more than hold their own against the Tigers.

"It was six to six with the starters in," Jamieson said. "We always scrimmage the best teams to prepare for our tough regular season schedule and we were happy with how we performed."

The Herd hopes it can achieve what it did two years ago on North Carolina's

In what varsity openweight Jennifer Prunoske '05 called a "great a team showing," Bucknell crew demonstrated its strength against Susquehanna and Binghamton universities on Feb. 15 in Bucknell's 7th annual Erg Armageddon held in Davis Gym. The Bucknell men's and women's crew teams medaled in every event in which they competed.

Erg Armageddon, a unique event where participants row on computer monitored rowing machines instead of boats, provides a rare opportunity for rowers to compete as individuals rather than in groups of four or eight.

"It is always a good experience knowing that you can go out there and worry only about yourself for 2,000 meters," varsity men's lightweight Aaron Bates '03 said. "Erg Armageddon is the best place for us to get our PRs [personal records] and vie for medals as individuals."

The Bucknell women's varsity openweights Prunoske, Julie Engel '03 and Rebecca Newman '04 displayed the depth of their team by sweeping all three medals in the 2,000 competition with what varsity women's coach Steve Kish said were "individually very good performances." Prunoske not only took the gold in this event, she also finished 1st in the women's varsity 500 dash. While she has only been rowing for two years, Prunoske currently holds two Bucknell records.

The women were not the only Bison to achieve a medal sweep. With times well under 7 minutes, the Bucknell

Bison track and field cruises into Patriot League Championships

Women look to win second Championship in a row and fifth crown in past six years; men set out to dethrone Army

By Evan Honeyfield
Staff Writer

Bucknell's track and field team saw its last tune-up meet last Saturday at the Bucknell Winter Classic before this weekend's Patriot League Track and Field Indoor Championships at Colgate.

"We went into the meet to answer a few questions regarding the Patriot League lineup and to give some people some experience," Head Coach Kevin Donner said.

The throwers took full advantage by using the meet as a big confidence booster. Liz Pendelton '05 won the weight throw, Laura Schafer '04 took the shot put, Adam Kaufmen '03 won the men's weight throw and Dan Frake '06 won the men's shot with a personal best.

"I am extremely excited to throw at leagues," Frake said after his win. "I want to contribute to our already-strong team. I want to score points, even if it is only one. That is one more point towards a conference championship."

Adam Jacob '03 looks to contribute big after his vault of 15-3 Feb. 14, which qualified him for the IC4A meet. Noel Powell '04 jumped over 24 feet in the long jump for the first time since his NCAA qualifying jump in January. Powell currently stands 16th on the national list, but is hoping to move up the list this weekend.

On the track, the most exciting event of the day was the men's 4x400-meter relay. Bucknell's team of Micah Wright '04, Chris Edwards '04, Eric Furst '03, and Brian Klotz '03 claimed the win. Edwards was tripped, but managed to get back up, keeping the Bison in the race. With the Bison trailing, Klotz stepped it up to anchor the win. The men's team erupted into senior Richard Alexander's rendition of "Who's House? Our House!" and "To Whom are You With? Bucknell!"

For the Lady Bison, the 200 sprinters Charity Brady '03, Tolu Fayanjuola '04, Kiley MacDonald '05, Rehana Lanewala '05 and Edwina Bourn '03 put on a show. Theresa Dennis '03 moved down to the mile and ran a nice race. She came back later to rabbit the 1,000, helping Nicki Piper '03 qualify for ECACs. Dennis is looking to win her first league title in the 5k and then place high in the 3k to help the women defend their title.

"We are so ready for this. We just need to continue doing what we are doing, improving consistently," Dennis said.

Donner realizes the team will face tough competition within the Patriot League.

"Our women are looking to win, with Navy being our biggest obstacle," Donner said. "Army looks good as well. The men look to be a dark horse with Army being the favorite. Lafayette seems to be running great and the American distance runners can do some damage to both Army and us."

Lou Palma '03 said that with a little bit of luck, the team can win.

"If the sprinters throw down on Lafayette and Army, if we can weather the storm that is American and if Army's throwers have a bad day, we could realistically sneak a win in there," Palma said.

Palma has gone so far as to grow a beard not only to impress the alumni with his "throwback style," but more importantly to use it as a rallying point for the team.

"I like to think of it as a representation of all the hard work the team has been doing since the beginning of Christmas break in preparation for this meet," Palma said. "It's symbolic and I think it means a lot to the guys."

Going into his first league meet, Frake seems ready to rally for a win.

"I like our chances at leagues. Our seniors' leadership, dedication and effort shows me that we can win not as individuals but as a team," Frake said.

Donner is also optimistic about the team's spirit.

"Confidence is huge and our athletes need to believe in themselves," Donner said.

Men head into Patriots

Starting Thursday, February 20th, the men's swimming and diving team will be competing for the Patriot League title at home in the Kinney Natatorium. Other schools vying for the championship include American, Army, Colgate, Holy Cross and Lafayette. Lehigh is the defending champion.

The team hopes to better last years fourth place finish. They can accomplish this goal by utilizing its depth and talent. It also has the advantage of swimming in its new home pool.

The Bison has had the past two weekends off and has been able to focus on the meet in practice. Also, many of the men have shaved their heads.

The trials portion of the meet begins at 10:30 a.m. Thursday, Friday, and Saturday. The diving will begin at 12:30 p.m. Finals will begin at 6:00 p.m., with two heats of each event being swum.

The meet will end Saturday, February 22nd. After the completion of finals that night, team, individual and coaches awards will be given out.

Less means more as women prepare for Patriot League Championships

By Stephen Schwanhausser
Staff Writer

In the final week of preparation for the Patriot League Championships, the Bucknell women's swimming and diving team is rebuilding and gaining confidence. The meet started this Thursday and runs through Saturday night. In a trials and finals set up, the top 16 competitors return in the evening after the morning's competition. Points are scored 1st through 16th, with the winner earning 20 and the 16th place contender gaining 1. There are two heats—the consolation final includes swimmers seeded 9th through 16th, and the final heat contains 1st through 8th. Once in these heats, swimmers cannot move up or down, meaning that no matter what, any individual in the final heat can score no lower than 8th, and no one in the consolation can move higher than 9th, regardless of time.

"It is essential to make it back for a night swim to score points. Without a strong morning swim you can't come back at all. It is also really important to make it back into finals," Co-captain Becky Dolan Even '03 said. "If you swim terribly at night if you made it into finals in the morning you will at least get 8th. We are hoping to have everyone make it back this year, and a majority in finals."

The swim season is long and focused. Every meet and day of training points to one meet a long way down the road, the Patriot League Championships. To advance beyond this meet means making it to a national level meet, a stretch for anyone on the squad. Consequently, this championship likely is the Bison's final meet, the one competition they have prepared for all year. Swimmers will begin taper, a three to five week period of increased rest, before the meet to prepare their bodies for competition. The taper is ended by shaving and putting on "fastskin" suits made of special material to help them finish first. Taper is individualized for each group, stroke and even for each person. This final week of preparation has contained a drastic decrease in training for all athletes.

"This last week we have really dropped off [in training]. As opposed to long two hour practices, we are barely in the water for a full hour and everything is race focused," Jamie Flick '05 said. "I am really starting to feel great in the water, and my confidence benefits as well. I am really excited."

With championships at Bucknell, enthusiasm is at a high. Tickets are being sold in advance due to expected crowds of nearly 1,000 people. With eight teams in competition, the Kinney Natatorium will be filled to capacity with athletes and fans. Especially with this week's weather, it is a huge benefit to the team to stay at home.

"The home pool advantage really gives us an edge. We have first choice of seating and our own locker rooms," Head Coach Jerry Foley said. "The crowd will have a tremendous impact and I think we are really ready. Short and sweet—it's gonna be a Bison weekend."

Fans are encouraged to come out and cheer on the team as it for a Patriot League title.

A great ride: Longden had it all

It can be said that all great jockeys must be blessed with good timing, keen judgment and maybe a little luck. Johnny Longden, who passed away on Feb. 14, exactly 96 years to the day he was born, had all of the above. He had a way not only of being in the right place at the right time, but of doing the right thing once he got there.

Longden's good fortune started years before he ever took to the back of a Thoroughbred. In 1912, a 5-year-old Johnny, his three sisters and his mother boarded a train from their home in Wakefield, England to Southampton, where they were to board a ship and embark on a journey to North America, where their father worked in the coalmines.

The train ran late, and the family reached the port only moments before the ship's gangplank was raised. They would have made it on board had little Johnny not momentarily disappeared, scampering off into the crowd. By the time his mother located her AWOL child, their window of opportunity to scramble onto the boat had expired.

Longden couldn't recall what caused him to stall his family's departure, but between that distraction and the tardy train, the course of sports history—horse racing history, specifically—was forever altered.

Of course no one could have known that at the time, as he and his family stood forlornly on the docks of Southampton and watch their vessel—a marvelous and massive product of mankind's genius called "Titanic"—drift away on its maiden voyage, without them.

Longden's brush with fate would end up as one of many anecdotes that can be shared about the Hall of Fame jockey, whose horsemanship skills began on the streets of a small prairie town in Alberta, Canada, where young Johnny learned to race horses "Roman-style"—balancing on the backs of two horses as they galloped side by side.

Longden left the racing world with plenty of memories.

There was the time that Santa Anita racetrack honored Longden's 72nd birthday with a furlong—an eighth of a mile—of lemon cake. The cake, covered with pink icing, stretched halfway down the homestretch, and at the time qualified as the Guinness Book of World Record's longest cake.

There was the time in 1969, when the retired-jockey-turned-trainer watched his trainee, Majestic Prince, storm to a victory in the Kentucky Derby, making Longden the only man in history to ride one Kentucky Derby winner and train another.

There was a day in March of 1966, a few days after the 59-year-old legend had announced that he would retire from riding, when he headed to the post for the last race of his career. His last mount would be a horse named George Royal—a longshot who had only won two of his last 12 races, and true to his odds, was floundering 15 lengths behind the leaders in the middle of the race.

As a crowd of 60,792 racing fans watched in awe, "The Pumper,"—a nickname given to Longden for his ability to coax a horse forward with his hands rather than the whip—rallied George Royal down the straightaway in a hand ride to catch Plaque by a nose at the wire.

It was his 32,413rd ride and his 6,032nd 1st place finish, which stood as a record for career victories until Willie Shoemaker broke it in 1970.

There were plenty of great races on his resume, aboard champions like Busher, T.V. Lark, Swaps, Your Host and Noor.

He once guided Rushaway to a victory in the 1936 Illinois Derby, and piloted the same horse to a win in the Latonia Derby the following day.

But perhaps the single most impactful gesture that Longden made for the sport was a small piece of advice that he offered to an owner named John D. Hertz.

Hertz owned a rambunctious, scrawny colt named Count Fleet, a horse so difficult to handle that Hertz figured it wouldn't be worth it to sacrifice anyone's safety or time and decided to sell the son of Kentucky Derby winner Reigh Count.

Longden, never one to back down from a challenge, discouraged Hertz's sale of Count Fleet, insisting that the colt was abound with talent.

"He doesn't scare me," Longden said. "I'll win lots of races with him."

And that's exactly what Count Fleet and Longden did. They won 10 races in 1942, and then all six of the colt's starts in 1943, a campaign that included victories in the Wood Memorial, Kentucky Derby, Preakness Stakes, Withers Stakes and a devastating, Triple Crown capping, 25-length domination in the Belmont Stakes.

Longden's intuitions saved Hertz from throwing away one of the best horses ever to set foot on a race track, and his polished yet daring skills combined with Count Fleet's tremendous speed and turn of foot to produce an almost undefeatable team.

The jockey loved to reminisce about his Triple Crown winner, whom he never once struck with the whip, reminding anyone willing to listen that no one ever got to see the best of Count Fleet—only Longden knew how good this horse really was.

Count Fleet died in 1973 at the age of 33, which translates to 90-something in horse years, an unusual age for such a hard-charging athlete.

Thirty years later, his partner in crime, the only man who truly knew what the horse was capable of, finally joined him, dying in his sleep at his home in California.

Like his most famous mount, Longden lived to an unusual age for an athlete who had subjected himself to decades of wear and tear. No one will ever know the 4-foot-11-inch hero's secret to longevity, which he had both on the track and in life. It seems he just always made the right choices.

He realized that Count Fleet was a good idea, which is more than can be said for most horsemen involved with the cranky colt. He knew, in 1969, that racing Majestic Prince in the Belmont was a bad idea, even though no one else would listen; the horse lost, was injured and never raced again. He knew how to guide a longshot to victory without even tapping it with the stick—he didn't force horses to win, he made them want to win.

Hell, maybe he even knew, at the age of 5, that a big ship called "Titanic" was a bad idea.

Smart guy. It's no wonder he lived to be 96.

What's your fantasy outlook?

Sunny, with a chance of trophy, thank you! So, select Kobe Bryant or Jason Kidd? Stack my team with running backs early or play it by the book? Assign five points for a hockey goal or three? Show that "twerp" who "talks the talk" but doesn't "walk the walk" just who is the real sports genius? Oh, yes, this is how we live. The Secret Society of Sports Fanatics. "We" go to the brink of stepping between the lines or purchasing a franchise and spending "goooooggles" of money.

It's that time of year again—school snow closings, warm thoughts of spring break plans and fantasy sports in full swing. Each year, around this time, I find myself chuckling like a child on Christmas morning. So many presents to open, so many possibilities ... Hey, that's not my size. Fantasy Sports—a sportsman's dream.

Early on, say 8 years old, kids who inherit a sports desire play to experience the game. Take, for example, basketball: good or bad, the fun of being with and having the opportunity to play regardless of skill level (which at this stage is but a blur) is enough. In our teen years, Jesse, that kid who seems to be wearing high heels to the games, but really is going through a Yao Ming growth spurt, begins to gain all the attention. Sure he is big, but his outside game is phenomena for his age, too. No fair. You begin to ride the bench some and wonder if dreams of the beach house in the Caribbean with beautiful people surrounding you might not come true after all. You see, as we grow older some athletes make it to the top of their profession; yet most don't. And for those that don't, the passion persists to continue to have an effect on the game, a feeling that, yes, I am in the action.

Like a surly white light, fantasy sports were invented and have now matured in the moneymaking, bragging rights, talk of the sports world. With fantasy basketball, hockey, baseball, football, auto racing and golf, there's a sport for everyone to enjoy and participate in. Picture this, you holding your very own draft with all the current players in your particular sport with nine of your hardcore sports friends! Having an online database assign point values correlating to each statistics (i.e. points, assists, rebounds) and calculating standings each and every day. It's like stealing your very own ESPN anchorman and doing a Vulcan mind meld. Major computer scientists to work, designing the virtual playground of today's has beens and never will bes.

Web site engines such as yahoo.com and cnnsi.com are putting their Personally, I am currently commissioning a Bucknell fantasy hockey league on yahoo.com. It all started a few months back with a couple guys discussing who knew more about hockey. Since we have matured from our Neanderthal ways, we took it to the next level of battlefields—cyber, fantasy style. What we encountered were choices. 1). Head to Head—nightly playing a new team in your league and deciding a winner each day. 2) Rotisserie Style—giving the team that has the most steals 10 points, the second highest steals amount getting nine points and further on down the line. 3) Standard—assigning points for each category and combining them all for a monster total score!

Now being "the Commish" allowed me to select what statistical categories our league would gather and what point values to assign for each statistic. Thank heavens for Professor of Mathematics Michael Frey's statistics for engineers class! Once the dirty work was finished, the next order of business consisted of planning for draft day—the single biggest day of fantasy sports. You can prerank your players and let the computer automate the draft, or you can sweat it out in the trenches and endure a sometimes two-hour long stare-off as you piece together your title team. Once the smoke clears from your "war rooms," it is then time to assess what you have or in some cases overlooked. What to do? Well, being the manager of your very own team, trades and free agent pick-ups are your arsenal of choice. What happens next is surely something even the butler from "Joe Millionaire," wouldn't see coming. Following your team each day or weekly; you either bask in your genius or quickly count down the days until the next major sport arrives.

What amazes me even now is the analysis and coverage fantasy sports are attaining. Years back when I first stumbled upon this portal to sports heaven, no credible sports writer would touch fantasy sports with a 10-foot pole (even with gloves on). But now the likes of prominent writers such as Rick Reilly, Chris Berman, Peter Gammons and more all chime in on a regular basis giving expect opinions on "sleepers" in a draft or who to cut.

What better way for a senior sports writer for The Bucknellian to, shall I say "force" himself, to keep tabs on the all happenings than to join a couple of these fantasy leagues! I promise, it won't be The Decker Effect!

Sport, not-a-sport

I think it's about high time I followed the greats and engaged in a little game of "sport, not-a-sport." As you'll notice, I've challenged some heavy hitters here, so sit back, relax and enjoy the dive.

Sport—football

Two 300-pound men run with all the strength and speed they can muster until they collide with each other: It's like playing chicken, except without cars. Afterwards, they pat each other on the asses. Only a sport could bring together homoeroticism into a Neanderthal competition reminiscent of the ancient Greeks.

Not a sport—baseball

Baseball is less about actual athletics or strategy than accounting and business management. I'll trade you two internal auditors and a payroll manager to be named later for $50,000.

Also, I'm tired of players complaining about the Yankees' payroll. I don't see YOU turning down your multimillion dollar contract. If it wasn't for you greedy bastards asking for so much damn money, there wouldn't be a problem in the first place. Until you start putting the players union in check, I don't want to hear you complain about the financial problems inherent in baseball ... leave that to the media, thank you very much.

Sport—basketball

Only a sport could have their playoffs last two months and EXPAND the first round. That takes balls.

Not a sport—high school basketball

Not a sport, merely a free-range farm where LeBron James can roam around without drugs, jerseys and cars. He is hormone-free (a chaste teen-ager), antibiotic free (he is easily susceptible to the common cold) and is treated better than your average, commercially-bred black teen-ager from Akron, Ohio.

Sport—cheerleading

It's entertaining, requires practice, planning, intensity, amazing physical exertion and talent. Don't let the fact that there are no individual cheerleading superstars dupe you into thinking there's no skill involved. Also, I've yet to find a movie about athletics more entertaining than "Bring It On," though a close second is "Eddie," where Whoopie Goldberg becomes the head coach of the New York Knicks and hilarity ensues.

Not a sport—boxing

Boxing is just dancing with fists, and it's not even entertaining like kung fu. And whatever integrity boxing had as a "hobby" was lost when Tonya Harding squared off against Paula Jones in "Celebrity Boxing." As Mike Tyson said so eloquently on ESPN.com, "What a splendid web we spin." What web is that Mike? Abuse? Ignorance? Cowardice? You are the Michael Jackson of the athletic community, just sit back and enjoy the welfare checks, we'll do the rest.

Not a sport—wrestling

Well it used to be ... thank you very much, Bucknell.

Sport—cock fighting

Where else but in a sport could I lose so much money on something other than call girls in as little as five minutes? Insane. Word to the wise, don't pick the one with the fire-red gullet because it may LOOK like he's in heat, but that's just what your bookie wants you to think.

Not a sport—golf

No offense to golfers. They've come a long way, especially under the wing of Tiger Woods, but until they start doing something with the mini carts, I can't respect them. They're sitting on a gold mine. Let them race.

What would be more exciting than seeing Tiger and Phil Mickelson racing down the fairway of the 11th at Augusta, trying to run each other into the dogwoods before Tiger finally goes kamikaze, pulls hard left into Phil's cart, jumps out of the moving vehicle as Phil loses control and crashes into the lake? Tiger gets a stroke deducted for the beauty with which he executed the roll once he evacuated the vehicle, and Phil gets penalized a point for falling in the water trap. It's that simple.

Sport—computer video game athletic simulations (i.e. "Madden," "NBA Live")

Just because you sit on your couch, munching puffed Cheez Doodles, chugging Mountain Dew Code Red at 4 in the morning, neglecting personal hygiene, living creatures and the appalling stench emanating from your unwashed body as something out of an epileptic flashback makes you briefly ponder what you're doing in your parents' living room at 29 just before the live-action cut scene fades into the main menu and your bloodshot, arid eyeballs look to each individual oxygen atom, hoping that just one may possess a loose hydrogen like a molecular oasis, doesn't mean that you're not playing a sport. I forgot what my point was, but it's a sport. Now I have to get back to the 14th year of my franchise. Jordan finally retired, but not until 2011.

February—the month when sports fans get off the couch

By Mark Walker
Staff Writer

February is to the sports fan, what summer is to the college student.

February is the one month of the year where diehard sports fans get up from the groove in the couch that they spent the previous 11 months creating. In February, sports fans actually have time to acknowledge and pay attention to their families. They also break out of their "sports bubble" and realize that there are greater issues going on in the world. February is truly as close as a sports fan can get to an off-season.

Many different factors contribute to making February the dullest month for the sports fan. First and foremost, February is the only month of the year in which neither of America's two biggest sports, baseball and football, are played professionally. The sports fan's off-season begins following the Super Bowl, as fans reluctantly say goodbye to the NFL for the next seven months. After football, most sports fans eagerly anticipate the start of the major-league baseball season and the end of their off-season. Baseball games do not get underway until the very end of March, with spring training games beginning in early March.

In February, sports fans can only get their fix of professional level competition from the NHL and NBA. Both of these leagues are in the greatest lull of their seasons. The original excitement of the start of the NHL and NBA seasons has long since worn off, and the excitement of the playoffs is still two months away. Therefore, February can be a painful month of minimal excitement regular season games, while anticipating the start of postseason play.

Probably the greatest excitement for a sports fan in February comes from basketball at the collegiate level. February hosts many exciting college basketball rivalries, as conference play heats up. For college basketball fans, February still pales in comparison to March, when the excitement of conference tournaments and, of course, March Madness take place. This causes college basketball fans to be eager to end February and to get on to the truly big games.

But wait, how could February be considered the worst sports month of the year when it plays host to the Daytona 500, the start of the Nascar season? I am sure that there is some excitement to Nascar that I do not appreciate, just as some people do not find the excitement in major-league baseball. In my book, Nascar is as much of a sport as is the Westminster Dog Show, another exhilarating "sporting" event in February. I just cannot consider car racing on the same level as baseball, football, hockey and basketball.

I simply do not get excited over watching people drive a car around a big oval track hundreds of times. Even worse, I cannot consider Nascar a sport when, for many people, the most exciting aspect of it is getting to see a spectacular accident, which often results in serious injuries or even fatalities. If you ask me, there is little difference between watching Nascar and setting up a chair alongside Route 15 and watching the traffic speed on by.

Sports fans, you can make it through this month. Pitchers and catchers have just reported, meaning that baseball's opening day is just around the corner. Conference tournaments and March Madness are rapidly approaching, and the NHL and NBA playoffs will soon be upon us!

Try to make the most of this month. Take your significant other to a movie. Visit your parents. Watch the news. And, if you absolutely need your fix of sports, pop in a highlights tape of your favorite team until the calendar turns to March!

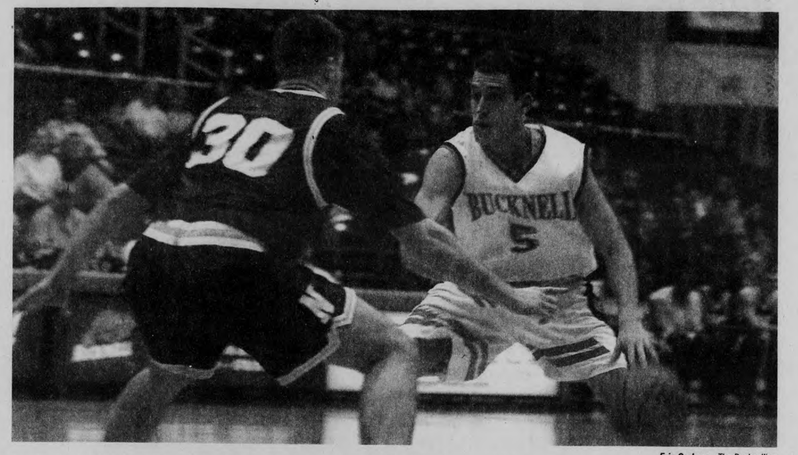
Bison snap three-game losing steak with win over Navy



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Dan Blankenship '03 faces off against a Navy player last Friday. The Bison snapped a three-game losing streak with a 59-41 win over the Midshipmen.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Head Coach Pat Flannery and several members of the Bison squad look out at the court during last Friday's game. The team will try to turn its victory over Navy into a winning streak this weekend.

game with a three-pointer.

"I felt good about getting the team on the scoreboard, considering we've been having some trouble this year putting up points," Niesz said. "I was happy about putting up some points for the team and contributing any way I can."

Head Coach Pat Flannery said Niesz has been playing well this season.

"He is a guy that has been in the mix all year for us," Flannery said. "He hasn't always matched up defensively with people, but he is confident and needs to keep shooting the basketball. He has stepped up and played well in a lot of spots."

Boakai Lalugba '03 recorded his 13th double-double of the season with 13 points and 12 rebounds after a six-point and five-rebound output on Feb. 11 at Lehigh. Flannery reflected on Lalugba's play and how imperative it is that the rest of the team perform well in order to open things up for Lalugba inside.

"I think that Boakai has been consistent throughout the year," Flannery said. "There are times when they [opposing teams] take things away from him. That is when we have to make shots. There are times where he can carry us if he is under control and there are times when the team has to step it up."

Lalugba also led an overall formidable team defensive effort with four steals and two blocks. He held Navy's best inside player, Francis Ebong, to 2 points and one rebound. The Orange and Blue held Navy scoreless into the eighth minute of the first half and led 11-0 before the Midshipmen ended the drought.

"We're ranked 3rd in the nation in defense. It was of no surprise to me. We take pride in our defense and in the fact that we can shut teams down like that. We do not accept anything less," Roland Webber '04 said. "It definitely helped our offense, too, because we always feed off of our defensive energy. We knew we had to set the tone early, especially after the way Navy embarrassed us down there in [Annapolis]."

Despite the fact that Bucknell led by as many as 12 points in the first half, the Midshipmen ended the frame on a 13-1 run, which pulled them to 24-21 at the half. The Bison went the final nine minutes of the half without scoring a field goal. Dominating the second half, the Bison scored the first 16 points. The Bison led by as many as 19 points twice in the second half.

Navy fell to 6-17 overall, and 2-8 in the league, and had its lowest scoring output against Bucknell since 1947. The Midshipmen shot 36 percent from the floor, while Bucknell, improving to 11-12 overall and 5-5 in the league, shot 44 percent. The Orange and Blue return to action tonight at Lafayette at 7:30 and Sunday at Army.

Niesz is optimistic about the prospect of a couple victories this weekend.

"We're going into next weekend knowing it's essential to win both games, get ourselves back on track, and put ourselves in a better position for lower seed for the [Patriot League] tourney," Niesz said.

Flannery believes that the mind-set the team has approaching the weekend is similar to the way in which it has been all season long.

"The attitude has been great all year," Flannery said. "We have been very resilient and we are looking forward to this weekend."

Bison rowers set personal records

Adam Wilcox—The Bucknellian

Novice rowers Priscilla Olle '06 (left), Lisa Kim '06 (center) and Courtney Luzzi '06 (right) all competed in the 2,000-meter novice openweight event. Kim took 4th with a time of 8:05.6.

men's novice lightweights Bill Bacheler '06, Eric Augustyn '06 and Dustin Friedland '06 put the competitors away by claiming title to the gold, silver and bronze in the 2,000K race.

"I went in hoping to get a personal record for the 2K and was able to do so with the help of cheering teammates and as a result of the hard work our team puts in on the ergs," Bacheler said. "In fact, almost every member of the novice squad scored personal bests on the rowing machines, a great accomplishment for us as a team."

The varsity men's lightweights experienced almost as much success as the novice by placing 1st and 2nd in the 2,000. Bates, finishing the 2,000 in 6 minutes, 26.9 seconds, and Brain Albert, with a time of 6:49.6, will set the pace for the varsity lightweight boat come springtime.

2. Joan Wendler	Bucknell	7:51.5

The men's and women's teams combined forces in the 1,000 mixed doubles event. Novice pair Ashley White '06 and Garrett Samuels '06 finished 1st in the novice competition, while Engel and Jeff Dasch '03 claimed the silver in the varsity event. Dasch also placed 2nd in the men's varsity openwieght 2,000 event with an impressive time of 6:25.5.

Erg Armageddon provided many rowers their first chance to show their teammates and competitors their strength on the erg. Surprisingly, the newest additions to both the men's and women's teams showcased their ability by medaling in the 2,000 and 500 events. Alexis Will '06, brand new to the team, surprised her teammates and coaches when she tied teammate Amanda Roof '06 for the gold in the women's novice lightweight 2,000k event.

"She's awesome!" Kish said.

Steve Ignatosky '06, in his debut competition, showed his strength and potential by taking 2nd in the men's 500 novice dash with a time of 1:27.3, just one second behind the 1st place finisher.

As coordinator of the event, Kish is already thinking about next year's annual indoor regatta, where he hopes to see a higher level of competition from a more diverse group of participating schools.

Matt Fornataro '05, president of the men's crew team, is confident about the upcoming spring season after witnessing the team's strength at the Erg Armageddon.

"With many of the novice already pulling under 7 minutes for the 2k, we should be looking forward to a great season this spring," Fornataro said.

Kish is less confident that fast erg times necessarily equate to winning races on the water, for rowing on the water as a team requires many different skills.

"While it is always nice to compete and do well, erg scores don't mean anything when it comes to the spring season," Kish said.

three-pointers in a row en route to an 8-2 run that shrank their deficit to 43-42 with 11 minutes remaining.

Almind intercepted a lazy Navy pass on the next possession and Franks dropped her third long ball of the game followed by a triple by Geosits on the next trip down the floor. Creamer reeled off six points of her own to open up a commanding 13-point advantage, 55-42. Geosits caused consecutive Navy turnovers to lead a stingy Orange and Blue defense. Almind continued to dominate the paint grabbing any rebound in sight to help the Bison rout Navy 73-60.

"I really thought we had a great team victory today," Fedorjaka said. "As I look through the stats, it's good to see some of the younger players adding a couple points or rebounds here and there to take the pressure off the big three [Creamer, Franks, Almind]. This game really reminded me of the team style of basketball we played last year in the championship game."

Co-captain Franks seemed to hobble due to a sore hip, but her shooting showed no ill effects as she shot a perfect 5-5 from the floor, including a 4-4 performance from downtown, to tally 17 points. Creamer continued her strong play and displayed her versatility by adding seven rebounds and seven assists to her 24 points. Once again, Creamer attacked the record books by breaking the school record for field goals attempted in a career. Almind does not even practice anymore and has tape covering her hurting shins, but still battled her way to 16 points and a career-high 15 rebounds.

"It was pretty good, but I missed 10 other box outs," Almind said about her rebounding performance.

The Orange and Blue are back on the road this weekend for their last road trip of the regular season. They will face Lafayette today at 5:30 p.m. and travel to Army for a 1 p.m. tipoff Feb. 23.

home field by upsetting the Tar Heels. After the win in 2001, the Bison went on to dominate the Patriot League and earn a berth into the NCAA tournament.

"That was a huge win two years ago," Sussman said. "It really helped us out with our mindset the rest of the season in that we believed we were for real."

The key to Bucknell's defense is goalie Justin Sussman '03 (above), the 2002 Patriot League Defensive Player of the Year and an honorable mention preseason All-America selection

While this is not a league game, which might normally be more important because the championship is concerned primarily with the teams' records within the League, the Bison still see the importance of a game against a team like North Carolina.

"It would be a real confidence booster and a great way to open up if we could take this one," Cara said. "It's a really big game; I think we'll have a much better season if we can win this opener."

One advantage the Bison do not have this season is that they will be unable to scout the Tar Heels before the game. The past two years the Bison have benefited from being able to see North Carolina play its first game against another opponent before squaring off. The NCAA restricts any scouting of teams during the preseason and since this will be North Carolina's first game of the season, the Bison will have to wait until the game starts to get a feel for what they're up against.

"We have a good idea of what's coming at us," Sussman said. "Personally I know I have to be ready for the best shooters in the country who can shoot 90 mph on the run. I think we'll be prepared for whatever we see."

If the Bison are to succeed this season, they'll certainly have their hands full. The schedule doesn't get much easier after North Carolina, with 5th-ranked Maryland and 16th-ranked Penn State coming soon after, along with league foes 20th-ranked Army and 25th-ranked Hobart.

"It starts here," Sussman said. "We want to show the country, the school and everyone that we're for real and a win over North Carolina would start to do that."

Working on the campaign trail: Kansas

By Peter Hackeman
Opinions Editor

After Wheeling, W.Va., it all looks the same through Ohio, Indiana and Illinois until Interstate 80 rolls around St. Louis; then it leads into the part of Missouri that looks suspiciously like the first three states, past Kansas City and south into the unmistakable flat, open fields of central Kansas. It took me 22 hours of driving to leave the battlefields of Bull Run and Manassas, Va., for the land of the Lecompton Constitution and bloody Kansas, and I couldn't have felt farther away.

I made my way into downtown Wichita, headed for the campaign headquarters and noticed how slow and empty the streets were, in the largest city in Kansas, at 4 p.m. on a Tuesday afternoon. With the exception of a few trees here and there and the absence of a pigtailed girl in ruby slippers welcoming me, it was pretty much what I expected. Looking back, that was the last time my expectations were anywhere near accurate.

I arrived in Wichita at the end of July to serve as the assistant press secretary for Carlos Nolla's campaign for the U.S. House of Representatives seat of the fourth district in Kansas. Carlos ran for this seat two years earlier in 2000, capturing 40 percent of the vote while having a paid staff of only one person and being outspent by his opponent by almost three to one. This impressive showing was made more so by the fact that Carlos was a Democrat running where there were almost twice as many Republicans as Democrats. In addition, the Republicans outnumbered the Democrats and Independents combined in our district. I was now the eighth staff member to come aboard, we were raising about as much money as our opponent and less than a majority of the district wanted to see the incumbent, our opponent, re-elected. Even though it was over three months from the election, we knew we had a good opportunity to win this race.

Deputy Campaign Manager Manny McCown (foreground) leads the paraders in a campaign chant. Every weekend until the middle of October, the campaign staff fanned out to at least one parade in the district to meet voters, hand out literature and gain support for candidate Carlos Nolla.

Silson (center) poses with two bikers before a Saturday morning parade. The many voters Hackeman met each day were very diverse, including these motorcyclists who help raise money for children by riding in parades.

That night I moved my belongings from my car into the basement of a townhouse where three of my co-workers were living. The entirety of the room contained a waterbed, heated no less, a treadmill and a Stairmaster—no closet or dresser for my clothes, no mirror or bathroom, and a small one-foot -by-two-feet window. It was more than I expected when I told Sean Rankin, our general consultant, in mid-July that I would live in the basement on someone's couch if I had to, should he hire me. At that point in July, I was barely 20 years old, a rising junior in college who was trying to get hired in a world where everyone else has a college degree and most have experience from previous campaigns. It must have been my zeal and persistence that convinced him to hire me because as luck would have it, I knew much less about winning a campaign than I had thought.

My first day, Campaign Manager Stephanie Mueller, Press Secretary Catherine Couch and I went with Carlos to an editorial board meeting in Arkansas City (pronounced ar-Kansas instead of Ar-kan-saw). The next night, after another editorial board meeting in El Dorado, I went to Sedgwick County Democrat's monthly meeting. Expecting to simply be introduced as a representative of the Nolla campaign, I was instead introduced and asked to make some comments about the campaign. Not yet knowing what Carlos's positions were on some of the issues or even what issues mattered most in this district, I ad-libbed something about this being a great year for Democrats, how we had a great staff and how the people were ready to elect a representative who would look out for them and not the special interests. I thought it was nervous and stale; the audience loved it.

A week later, on Aug. 5, I helped Delia Garcia, the field director, finalize the get-out-the-vote plan for the primary the next day. We easily won the primary and began gearing up for the general election campaign. Days later, though, Delia's mother became seriously ill on vacation and I became the acting field director while Delia went home to take care of her mother and her family's restaurant, Connie's. When it became clear that she wouldn't be able to return full time, I was thrust into the position on a permanent basis. With extensive guidance and help from Stephanie, Sean and our field consultants, we got our program quickly on track.

In our campaign, like most others in the country, there were three main sections—fundraising, communications and field. The field group is responsible for recruiting volunteers, preparing for events like parades, distributing yard signs and bumper stickers and reaching out to constituency groups and voters on a one-on-one basis. One of my housemates, Nat, was already working with the organized labor federations in our area and would soon expand his scope to reach out to all the constituency groups in our district.

The next two months were filled with 14-, 16-, sometimes 18-hour days, which flew by at alarming speed. The mornings were devoted to calling precinct committeepeople, party county chairs, state house candidates and other key contacts in our district to coordinate and communicate as much as possible. The afternoons were spent calling potential volunteers to encourage them to help out and to schedule them to come in. The evenings were spent recruiting more volunteers and managing today's volunteers who were usually on the phones calling voters to answer questions and identify which voters were still undecided about whom they would support. After a few minutes at the local YMCA, I would head back to work to prepare for the next day's activities.

Before we knew it, October began. We had 12 staff members, with Delia back leading our Hispanic voter outreach effort, but we weren't the only ones adding more staff. The Kansas Democratic Coordinated Campaign, a combination organization funded by our campaign, the Sebelius for Governor campaign and the Kansas Democratic House caucus brought in a new district director named Tess. Tess was from Minnesota and had more campaign experience than most anyone else involved in the area. She was originally from Kansas and had a daughter in college at Kansas University. For a woman of her experience, she had as much if not more energy and enthusiasm than the college students working for her. She is an exceptional person who taught me more than I could have imagined about field organizing, politics in general and most of all people.

The campaign kicked into high gear with only a few weeks left. All the yard signs had been given out to supporters and we had so many volunteers in the evenings that we were able to expand the times for calling and install new phone lines. One Saturday, over 100 volunteers gave up the whole day to walk around specific neighborhoods knocking on doors to pass out campaign literature and answer any questions the voters might have. We had volunteers who came in three or four days a week and made phone call after phone call for two or three hours a night.

Unfortunately, our opponent, Rep. Todd Tiahrt, also sensed the building support for Carlos. Tiahrt began raising obscene amounts of money, flying in Republican leaders from the U.S. House and putting the squeeze on his out of state contributors. He spent over $1 million, fully half of it coming from political action committees. We actually raised more money from individual contributors than our opponent did, but it wasn't enough to stem the tide of outside money.

For the last two weeks, Tiahrt seemed to have a commercial on during every half an hour on the network channels in Wichita. But it wasn't just the quantity of commercial time that hurt us; it was the message that Tiahrt was employing. He claimed that Carlos was against extending unemployment benefits; Carlos supported extending the benefits further than Tiahrt did. Tiahrt claimed that Carlos wanted to raise taxes on the middle class; Carlos had for weeks been talking about a middle-class tax cut larger than the one that Tiahrt supported. Unfortunately, in modern politics, when we were only able to afford one commercial explaining Carlos's ideas for every three or four Tiahrt commercials distorting our positions, voters believed our opponent's lies.

Come Election Day, we still thought we could win the race. I arrived home at 4:45 a.m. that morning, showered and was back at work by 5:15 a.m. with more energy than I think I've ever had. We had over 400 volunteers and over 100 paid workers in the district that day, accounting for over 1,500 hours of volunteer time and almost 1,000 hours of paid time. I was responsible for managing the 20 volunteer phone lines in our building and the 12 additional lines elsewhere in Wichita. With help from the members of the Coordinated Campaign, we were constantly preparing new lists of supporters to call and remind to vote, crossing off those who had already voted every three hours.

Every two hours the senior staff had a strategy meeting to review the tide of voters in each precinct so that we could refocus our efforts in the streets and on the phones to the areas most in need. One of our college interns kept a 7-foot-by-7-foot board on the wall to track which of our over 40 precincts were currently being targeted and which volunteers were calling where. During the course of Election Day, we made 9,500 calls to potential voters reminding them to make it to the polls.

Five minutes before the polls closed at 7 p.m., we stopped making get-out-the-vote calls. For the first time in four months, there was nothing more we could do to influence the outcome of the election. I walked around thanking the volunteers, many of whom I had worked with for months and would never see again. We made a few final arraignments; I printed off the vote expectations by county, gathered the turnout numbers from the last poll check and drove to the townhouse to shower.

On our way to the election night party, John Silson and I reflected on what a crazy ride the campaign had been. Over the radio, we heard the first couple precinct returns come in, which had Carlos leading. Maybe, we thought, despite of our financial disadvantages in a tough Republican district, we might have pulled off the biggest upset in House races this year.

Unfortunately, as the rest of the results came in, it soon became apparent we would not be so lucky. In the end, Carlos received only 37 percent of the vote and Tiahrt was re-elected to serve a fifth term in Congress. Once results were confirmed, Stephanie took Carlos aside to tell him the news. He went upstairs to his suite, told his family the results, thanked them for all they had gone through during the campaign and then made his way back downstairs to give his concession speech. He entered the ballroom to rousing applause and walked over to the podium. Instead of giving the prepared speech, Carlos spoke to the crowd from his heart. At a point where his dreams of serving the people had been dashed, where his supporters should have been consoling him, Carlos lifted the spirits of all of us in the room that night. By the end, all of the staff had tears in our eyes. We weren't tearing just because we lost that night, or even because a good man, a real family man, had lost, but because we had the opportunity to work for such a good person, one who lived his life by the same priorities on which he ran his campaign.

That same night the race for attorney general of Kansas was won by a reactionary whose only experience as a prosecutor had been as an intern and a triple-amputee, Vietnam veteran from Georgia lost his re-election to the Senate because he was labeled as unpatriotic. Had it not been for Carlos' speech, I know I couldn't have kept the same belief in our political system.

Protesters carry a sign asking for another world that is possible—one without hunger, as a part of the World Social Forum. Junior Magdalena Nadar's visit to Brazil allowed her to see the contradictions between two different worlds, one filled with luxury and another filled with poverty and disease.

By Magdalena Nadar
Contributing Writer

I almost forgot that I was in Porto Alegre, Brazil, after having listened to countless presentations in Spanish, Arabic, Italian, German, French, Hebrew and English at the World Social Forum (WSF) held from Jan. 23-28. The WSF was created three years ago in response to the annual World Economic Forum and has the motto "Another world is possible."

More than 100,000 participants, including delegates of both nonprofit and corporate organizations, observers, professionals and activists, joined together to launch proposals challenging current globalization efforts dominated by neo-liberal and capitalist ideology.

The overwhelming diversity of delegates, representing 156 countries, required the assistance of translators who helped break down the language barriers that might have prevented effective communication.

Fortunately, along with the translation of words emerged the memories, frustrations, revelations and hopes of thousands of faithful individuals across the globe. Conferences, panel discussions, workshops and testimonies created an effective outlet of expression. The event was surprisingly well-organized and equipped with free Internet access, as well as heaps of literature supporting the various causes of international and national social organizations.

But when did words alone do any justice? Words have undoubtedly served as a convenient medium to communicate with one another through e-mails, newsletters, speeches, pamphlets, books, etc., but the forum sought an even more basic form of expression. The WSF urged its participants to search for a stronger communication that would surpass even the elements of language; it emphasized the power of humanity.

We are all too aware of the impoverished, of the malnourished, of the overworked and underpaid, of the persecuted, of the abused, of the diseased, of the starving, and of the dying. We can no longer play the ignorance card. In their speech entitled "How to Stand Up to the Empire," Arundathi Roy, accompanied by Noam Chomsky, said "Secrets are history and history is known…." There are hundreds of independent media Web sites and free alternative publications. There are also thousands of declassified documents and documentaries that inform us of the CIA's accountability for the bloody overthrows of left-wing governments. But you might not be able to recognize these terms as written because they are usually referred to as "fighting for justice," "fighting for freedom" and, of course, "fighting for democracy." Still, we continue our daily lives in denial, a choice we collectively and consciously make as a society.

I have been recently battling with the fact that so many injustices occur every single day that we do not see. How is it that with the existence of so much information technology we can still be left in the dark? I realized that the answer is rooted in the power of choice. We've successfully made the choice to distract ourselves with mindless paperwork, with the melodramatics of fictional characters and fanaticism for sports teams so as to claim "ignorance" when we don't see all that is in front of us, waiting to be discovered. I think the title of director John Smihulah's film more concisely expresses what I am struggling to say; the flourishing hypocrisies of our social, economic and political policies are "Hidden in Plain Sight."

Our government and its corporate interests assure our "protection" from the harsh realities so that we can continue functioning as content and productive consumers. I'm not trying to blame us; we choose to engage in the activities we do because they are familiar to us and because they are what we know and understand.

I propose that we put this comfort aside so that we can explore our own vulnerability on both a national and individual level. As a traveler, I've only recently begun to discover the beauty of finding myself outside of the element that I've been used to for so long.

During my incredible seven months in South America, I've encountered two types of travelers. There are those who have been wandering for months dining on gourmet steaks and making sure not to miss happy hour at the trendy pubs "gringos" frequent. They can't stop referring to how incredibly cheap everything is. One of my hostel mates said to me, "Shopping? How can you resist? Everything is dirt-cheap." According to them, South American energy is always happy, well-lit and carefree, just another way to romanticize the reality of poverty.

Then there are those who have also been traveling for several months, but with a uniquely different perspective of the very same place. Most likely they are financially on the same level as the former group, but what distinguishes them is how they choose to experience South America. They eat at the ambience-void joints and converse with the locals instead of the American clique they met back at the hostel. They accept the often unsettling questions and criticisms posed by the curious South Americans who are trying to comprehend the political beliefs of their neighbors to the north.

My point is, we can travel thousands of miles away from home without ever having really left. I learned that as we live amid two types of travelers, we also live amid two different worlds.

Our world offers the luxuries of drinkable water, healthy meals and warm clothing. No matter what country we choose to visit, our world gives us the privilege of unlimited access.

Then there is a world much darker than ours. I was moved to a great extent having listened to presentations on the lack of potable water the communities of Bolivia face as a result of water privatization companies. I was unsettled to learn of the brutal treatment of Mexican workers as a result of multinational corporation expansionism. I was appalled to learn of the thousands of South Koreans who are discovering health complications due to the chemical leakage of former Cold War U.S. military tanks. I was enraged to learn of the torture tactics taught to Latin soldiers by the School of the America's in Fort Benning, Ga.

There honestly isn't one other element that links these two worlds together better than the power of humanity. I'm referring to the responsibility we have as human beings to act now and acknowledge social inequities. We've always known that the world's filthy rich constitute a substantially smaller percentage than the world's impoverished population. Every day, the world's truths are unraveled before our very eyes.

While we can't feel guilty for our privileges, we can feel doubtful, insecure and even vulnerable. We can question our own actions and allow others to question our perspectives.

We can abandon our comfort zone just for a second, if it means helping us shed light on the terrifying truths that plague our own race. In the end, those who allow themselves to be vulnerable are in fact the stronger ones.

Since I have been in South America, I've been enlightened by the idea of simplicity. Underneath diversions that complicate our lives, it is crystal clear that there is one thing we truly value—the lives of other human beings with whom we have a greater bond than anything else we have, or will soon discover.

If the WSF is too ambitious to believe that we can create another world, then perhaps we ought to just focus on creating one.

One in Four discusses sexual assault

By Alyson Walker
Features Editor

Rape only happens with strangers and to women—and those women ask for it because of the way they dress. These are just a few of the misconceptions about rape that the One in Four program is trying to eliminate from the University community.

One in Four evolved from "Men Talking to Men," a program that shows the story of a police officer who was raped by two men. Mary Snyder, interim director of the Women's Resource Center, and Don Wirick, the sensitive crimes officer for Public Safety, changed the program's focus after receiving interest from many women who wanted to join the men's discussion group. The program shifted to gain interaction from all students.

Jennifer Parker '04 said that the video changed her ideas about the stereotypes of sexual assault.

"I thought the presentation was effective in that it made me think of sexual assault from a different perspective," Parker said. "I think that hearing a man's story of being raped gave myself and the audience an opportunity to really think about sexual assault—how the survivor felt and realize that this serious crime can happen to anybody."

The main focus of the program is how to help sexual assault survivors and to understand the pain that is caused by sexual assaults. It also discusses different forms of communication that may be useful when engaging in intimate encounters. The name is derived from the statistic that one of every four women will either be sexually assaulted or be the attempted victim of assault, according to a study done by Robin Warshaw in 1994.

One in Four held approximately 15 programs last semester, with audiences ranging from different fraternities and sororities to residential halls to athletic teams. At the beginning of each session, the audience members were asked how many of them had been somehow touched by sexual assault—whether they personally were survivors or had a family member or friend who was a survivor. Snyder said that at each program at least half of the participants had been affected.

> "The program tries to put the audience in the survivors' shoes and then tells how to help them."
> —Mary Snyder, interim director of the Women's Resource Center

Snyder said that the program promotes a greater understanding about how sexual assaults can occur, how a survivor might react and how to help a survivor.

"The greatest asset is that it evokes empathy in the audience for sexual assault survivors and what they go through. The program tries to put the audience in the survivors' shoes and then tells how to help them," Snyder said.

Mark Wenstrom '05 has been an audience member for two One in Four programs.

"I learned about how women view daily life differently from men, especially with the steps they take to prevent rape," Wenstrom said.

By teaching understanding, Snyder hopes that the program also teaches sensitivity while correcting common myths about assault.

"One in Four beats down the misconceptions without being strictly negative. Instead, it shows how to help the survivor. It teaches to get help for yourself and your friend," Snyder said. "It shows healthy ways of being together and promotes a campus of mutual respect. You don't know who has been assaulted or abused, or who might be more sensitive to sexist, and especially racist, jokes."

After a training session in early February, One in Four has a healthy membership of approximately 20 students who hold weekly meetings and are working to create a brochure and a Web site.

The group deals with all different audiences, and this semester they will reach out to local high schools to discuss violence in relationships. One in Four also hopes to work with other area colleges on new programs and perspectives.

"Monologues" at University: To V or not to V

BY MELINDA KUMMER
Arts & Entertainment Editor

❖ THEATER REVIEW

Controversy surrounded the University's production of Eve Ensler's "The Vagina Monologues" last Friday and Saturday nights. The introduction of the new monologues written by men, the sexuality presented and graphic descriptions have been both supported and criticized. At the end of the showings, one question begged to be answered—Does "The Vagina Monologues" achieve its goal of raising awareness of violence against women?

This question has been answered in many different ways and the campus remains divided on a conclusive answer. Some would argue the monologues actually defeat their own purpose, while others stress the importance of celebrating the female gender in its struggle against violence. In any event, the production has started a political dialogue about the means of countering and preventing violence.

Some monologues more successfully than others communicated the global problem of violence that women face. "My Vagina was My Village," a monologue featuring Laura Jacque '05 and Laura Holmes '06, specifically delved into the issue of mutilation of women during the war in Bosnia. A deeply moving piece, emotions ran high as the stories of these victims of war were told. The strength and dignity portrayed by these women was nothing short of inspiring, not only to give support to organizations helping violated women, but personally as well.

Another influential monologue was Ensler's own story, "I Was There in the Room," a description of seeing her granddaughter born. A truly deep part of a woman's essence is found in her ability to give birth. The awesome experience of giving another human life is one unique to women and often the least appreciated womanly function. Women have the privilege of being able to give birth—continuing the circle of life—as described in this monologue that concludes the performance.

Other monologues have been nationally criticized for their sexual, even "immoral" focuses. The V-Day College Campaign has addressed many of these issues. "The Little Coochie Snorcher That Could" and "The Woman Who Loved to Make Vaginas Happy" bring issues of statutory rape and prostitution into the quest of women learning to love themselves. "The Coochie Snorcher" monologue is one woman's story of finding herself at 16 when she met a 24-year-old women who introduced her to lesbianism. This monologue has been criticized for condoning statutory rape between women, but V-Day representatives from the University point out the importance of diversity in the vagina stories. The monologue described itself as "politically incorrect" and V-Day stresses that this story is only one way to find female salvation and peace.

"The Woman Who Loved to Make Vaginas Happy" tells the story of a woman who leaves her job as a lawyer to become a prostitute for women. Some women on campus have questioned the empowerment of such a monologue in an age when women are finally being seen as intellectual equals to men. The reduction of an entire woman's essence to her biology seems to ignore her intelligence and spirituality, instead favoring her sexuality.

"Most times, women are reduced to being their vaginas by society. These monologues serve to connect women to their sexuality, and encourage oneness with their physical body," co-director Ibby Cizmar '03 said.

Jen Mellon '04 performed "Reclaiming Cunt," a monologue about changing the meaning of the derogatory term. She said that women are assaulted because they have vaginas.

"If [women] have violence inflicted upon them simply because they are women, then it must be recognized that what makes us women is our vaginas," Mellon said.

V-Day strives to initiate discourse about vaginas and sexual assault.

"How can we talk to women and men about something as sensitive as violence against women and be uncomfortable using the word vagina? Especially considering that much violence against women takes place around that area of their bodies? That's why vaginas are the subject matter," President of V-Day Bucknell Val Lam '03 said.

"I am more than my vagina," Charissa Reimer '05 said after viewing the show.

While the show focuses on the sexuality of women, many women on campus feel that other aspects of womanhood are more crucial to highlight.

The addition of a monologue, at the end of the show, written and performed by men, furthered the theme of creating a violence-free world. Written by Aaron DeRosa '03, David Meilleur '04 and Joseph Trullinger '03, this portion of the production presented three different views from a male perspective on the issue of violence.

"I think it's fantastic that men are committed to ending violence and that they are putting themselves into the political arena onstage," Cizmar said of the male participation.

Emily Rockiki '05 also enjoyed the new piece.

"I thought the new monologue was insightful and well done. I thought it only increased the effectiveness of portraying the problem of violence against women," Rockiki said.

The audience was receptive to adding to "The Vagina Monologues."

"The integration of these men into 'The Vagina Monologues' was without a doubt a step forward for V-Day, in that it showed the importance of support and solidarity regardless of gender," said graduate student Katie Parker, the writer of a women's piece incorporated into the production as a part of the new "Violence-Free World" campaign.

By adding both the women's and men's pieces, Parker said the production shows "that problems like violence against women are not dealt with exclusively by women, but that they are everyone's problem."

During the dialogue period at the end of Saturday night's show, an audience member said she would have rather spent more time appreciating the women's production. The directors, Cizmar and Lee Cromwell '05 also expressed concern for "protecting women's space" onstage. The separation of Ensler's compilation from the University's own monologues was symbolized by the the stage curtain closing.

The difficulty in generalizing the success or failure of "The Vagina Monologues" to meet its goal is apparent. To appreciate some parts while disagreeing with others is a decision individual members of the audience must make for themselves. Since proceeds from the performance went to Susquehanna Valley Women in Transition (SVWIT), some members of the University purchased tickets despite not agreeing with the show's content. In fact, $4,014 from 734 ticket sales alone was donated to SVWIT. As far as success is measured, the monologues were successful in their support of a worthy charity even if a campus is divided about whether the ends justify certain means.

New "Chappelle's Show" comes to Comedy Central

BY JOSH HERWITT

❖ TELEVISION REVIEW

Perhaps you have seen him in such films as the college-kid favorite "Half-Baked," "Undercover Brother" or even in "The Nutty Professor," or maybe in television appearances on HBO, "The Late Show with David Letterman" or "Late Night with Conan O'Brien." But if you have not had the opportunity to discover the talented and witty humor of comedian Dave Chappelle, Comedy Central has presented "Chappelle's Show" as one of its premier new television series debuting Jan. 22 at 10:30 p.m. Chappelle will star in 12 30-minute episodes in this new, much-anticipated and confrontational sketch-comedy series.

Comparable to other current sketch-comedy series such as the renowned "Saturday Night Live" as well as HBO's "The Chris Rock-Show," Chappelle offers a more personal side to sketch comedy with his satires of street life and pop culture lifestyles. Each sketch is introduced by Chappelle in stand-up format in front of a studio audience, and incorporates his perspective on all forms of American culture, conceptualizes them and has viewers bursting into laughter. These ideas are often hilarious but controversial.

One of the most notorious and ironic sketches of "Chappelle's Show" is Chappelle's character Clayton Bigsby, a blind white supremacist who, is actually black. Another memorable sketch includes his parody of the Mitsubishi commercial featuring the obnoxious singing and dancing female passenger. In other outrageous and satirical scenes, Chappelle portrays a drug addict who speaks to a fourth-grade classroom about his addiction and its benefits.

In addition to Chappelle's humor, other guests will appear frequently on his show. Co-created and co-written by Neal Brennan, who also worked with Chappelle on "Half-Baked," the series will feature multiple acts from top music guests in hip-hop and R&B genres including Busta Rhymes, Fat Joe, The Roots, Talib Kweli, GZA, Killer Mike and Slum Village.

The arrival of "Chappelle's Show" should draw attention across the country to Comedy Central and the work of Chappelle and Brennan. I recommend checking it out on Comedy Central on Wednesdays and Fridays at 12:30 a.m., Saturdays at 1:30 a.m. and Sundays at 10:30 p.m.

Ooh la la—French films in Lewisburg

BY KRISTI JOHNSTON
Senior Writer

For the second year in a row, the Campus Theatre is planning to present a festival of modern French cinema. Starting tonight and running through Feb. 27, the festival hopes to attract the crowds that made last year's event such a success.

Officially titled Le Festival du Cinéma Français 2003, the festival is made possible by the Society for French-American Cultural Services and Educational Aid (FACSEA), a nonprofit agency in New York. This year's funding is double that of last year, allowing the Campus Theatre to present more films.

In addition to the seven film features, the theater will be showing a silent short film each night. These short films include works by French cinematographers such as Georges Melies, Alice Guy, Ferdinand Zecca, Louis Feuillade and the Lumière brothers.

Assistant Professor of English Eric Faden, who owns the Campus Theatre, is looking forward to this year's festival.

"I'm especially excited about Jean Cocteau's 'La Belle et la Bête,'" he said, referring to the film version of "Beauty and the Beast" that preceded Disney's by almost 50 years. "It's a beautiful, beautiful film, fully restored. This is the way the film should be viewed."

While providing entertainment, organizers hope the festival will provide viewers with a unique educational opportunity.

"The festival is a unique opportunity, not only for students, but for everyone in the community to gain a better understanding of the historical and aesthetic influence of French cinema in our visual culture today," Assistant Professor of French Philippe Dubois said in a press release. "The grant from FACSEA, as well as the support from [the University] and various local communities, underlines the area's growing interest in French culture. The festival will help everyone, especially students, make important linguistic and cultural connections outside the typical classroom environment."

Most of the films that will be shown have been made within the last 18 months.

"This [will be] a big cross section of new French cinema," Faden said. "We are trying to show in a week's time what French cinema looks like in 2003."

Tonight's opening of the festival includes a reception at 7 p.m. The theater will be displaying original articles concerning "La Belle et la Bête," including an original script, a copy of Cocteau's set journal and many unique photographs.

Other films to be shown include "Huit Femmes," "Les Rivières Pourpres," "L'Anglaise et le Duc," "L'Emploi du Temps," "Une Affaire du Goût" and "Lumumba."

"We have everything from mainstream, commercial films ... to comedies," Faden said. "We are showing things that are typical of French cinema and things that are atypical of French cinema. I think a lot of people will be surprised."

The festival is sponsored by FACSEA, the Women's and Gender Studies Office, the French Club, the Department of English, the Association for the Arts, the Humanities Institute, the Department of Foreign Language Programs, the Bleu Plate Café, the Lycoming College French Program and the Susquehanna University Department of Modern Languages.

> "The festival is a unique opportunity, not only for students, but for everyone in the community to gain a better understanding of the historical and aesthetic influence of French cinema in our visual culture today."

SR-71 to play at Uptown tomorrow night

❖ MUSIC REVIEW

SR-71's major label debut in 2000, "Now You See Inside," is a catchy, energetic album loaded from top to bottom with strong vocal harmonies, solid instrumentation and clever lyrics.

From the opening track "Politically Correct," singer/guitarist Mitch Allan exhibits a needling, sarcastic approach with the lyrics: "So you conform with the best of intentions ... After all, that's what this country was founded on/do nothing different, just fall in line."

The lyrics of their biggest radio hit, "Right Now," takes a humorous look at the end of a relationship: "She may not be Miss Right, but she'll do right now."

In addition to the standard rock-band formula of guitars, bass and drums, several tracks also have touches of keyboard and synthesizers, and a few others, such as "Go Away" and "Empty Spaces," are rooted in acoustic guitars.

The three other members of the band all contribute backing vocals on this album, creating interesting sweeps of layered vocal harmonies. These types of vocals are featured on tracks such as "Fame (What She's Wanting)," "Non-Toxic" and "Alive."

Before the recording of their 2002 album, "Tomorrow," the band replaced original drummer Dan Garvin with John Allen. According to the band's Web site (sr-71.net), original bassist Jeff Reid and guitarist Mark Beauchemin left the band in January and have been replaced by two new musicians from the band's hometown of Baltimore.

"The band ... took a crash course in rock and roll hedonism. 'Lots of nights, lots of cities, lots of girls,' says guitarist Mark Beauchemin, describing both the tour and 'Tomorrow.' 'It's all there on the record. You've just gotta read between the lines,'" according to the band's Web site.

The newly revamped SR-71 will take the stage at Uptown tomorrow. Doors will open at 9:30 p.m. and admission is free with BU ID.

Vision 2010: A plan for the future

Task force white papers released for four of five portions—BSG makes suggestions for improvements on student affairs draft

BY RACHEL LASKOW
Senior Editor

University President Steffen Rogers recently released the task force white papers—drafts available online—for the academic affairs, student affairs, enrollment management and finance and administration portions of Vision 2010. The task force white paper for the final part, University Relations, will come out before spring break.

Vision 2010, which Rogers announced in his inaugural address, describes the University's strategic plans for the next decade.

"We want to make certain that we reaffirm the attributes of Bucknell that have always defined this University and that we address the future, because that future will be considerably different than when our last plan was put in place in 1990," Rogers said.

Rogers originally hoped to present the final document to the Board of Trustees in April, but during a recent meeting of the University Council, the Faculty Council suggested that more time was needed. The University Council and Board of Trustees leaders endorsed the extended schedule.

"I am much more interested in the quality of the document than meeting a deadline. After all, we are planning the future of Bucknell. A few extra months could make a real difference," Rogers said.

At press time, four white papers were out to the campus and governance committees for feedback. Rogers hopes to release the document to the trustees immediately following the Oct. 6 faculty meeting. Formal consideration by the trustees will not occur until their November meeting.

According to Rogers, although closed strategic plans are easier, he chose to have an open strategic plan while creating Vision 2010 because he wants everyone involved in the process.

"Everyone has difficulty with an open strategic plan because it doesn't have nice clean lines. The frustration levels are often higher, but in the end we will come out with a better document because there are a lot bright people on this campus feeling their ideas into the final product. Hopefully, it will be a document in which everyone will have ownership," Rogers said.

Academic Affairs Task Force Report

According to Provost/Vice President for Academic Affairs Stephen Bowen, the goal of the academic portion of Vision 2010 is to refine and reaffirm the University's identity and mission, and to set priorities for academic programs that will best help us advance that mission.

International education and civic engagement are two areas on which the University will focus.

According to Bowen, anyone who stands back and looks at how the world has changed over the past 20 years can see how our lives are increasingly interconnected with those of other people across the globe.

"Most of us feel that humanity is on a fast track to the future and that future is going to be a global future, not just a local future," Bowen said.

Rogers also finds international education important.

"We are seeing such a change globally. I would hope that we would want our students to experience something University President Steffen Rogers released the task force white papers parts of 2010. Drafts are available online for student input.

University President Steffen Rogers was ready to plan for the future of student life, as he stated in his inaugural address in fall of 2000. With the assistance of the Student Life and Culture Task Force and Vision 2010 Steering Committee, Rogers released the Student Life and Culture Plan within Vision 2010 to the University community for comments on Feb. 13.

Since that date, student organizations, as well as individual students, have been invited to make comments and criticisms of the document. Bucknell Student Government [BSG] suggested alterations to the existing document.

The plan is designed to integrate academic education and student life. The introduction of the text states, "Our vision for student life and culture at Bucknell has one overarching objective: that every student be deeply involved in his or her own education and personal development."

Vice President of Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70, who serves as the chair of the Student Life and Culture Task Force, said that the task force was looking to create an environment of active learning rather than passive gleaning of facts and data. This goal is expounded on by five issues—educating the whole person, personal engagement, diversity, leadership and setting.

Under each of these issues is a goal for the University and initiatives to help implement and achieve these goals.

To educate the whole person, the University goal is to "more deliberately and effectively help our students to deepen their understanding of themselves along multiple dimensions, including the intellectual, social, emotional, spiritual, physical and occupational." Initiatives to help reach this University softball players Brandi Porter '03 and Ashley Sarnecky '06 sustained serious injuries and were rushed to the hospital after the track and field team's 700-pound throwing cage shifted position and fell on top of them while they attempted to move it in on Feb. 15 in Gerhard Fieldhouse.

Porter broke her femur and severely damaged her face. Sarnecky broke the lumbar region of her vertebrae. Both student-athletes are currently at home recovering under the care of their families.

"The University is in the process of completing a thorough review of the circumstances surrounding the accident," Director of Athletics and Recreation John Hardt said. "The purpose of this review is to determine and verify all facts surrounding the incident. Our goal is to help ensure that everything possible is done to prevent any similar occurrence in the future."

What is known is that a number of softball players were helping their coaches move the cage to its appropriate storage area after their scrim-

Future of Senior Night in jeopardy after incident

The future of Senior Nights is in jeopardy after a student was transported from Big Andy's Bar and Grill in Milton to Evangelical Community Hospital for treatment after an alcohol overdose last Thursday.

Because of this incident, the University General Counsel is reviewing whether or not Senior Night should be continued for the remainder of the academic year.

Before a decision is made, the counsel will determine the liability of the University if a a similar incident occured in the future.

"The state law mandates that it is the responsibility of the establishment owning and operating the liquor license to deny visably intoxicated customers service," said Ron DeOrzio '03. "Big Andy's alone should be held responsible for the alcohol overdose and subsequent hospitalization of the Bucknell student who was served there last Thursday."

Currently, the University only provides funding for transportation and a disc jockey.

G. Love named as opening band for Third Eye Blind

The Concert Committee announced that G. Love will perform as the opening act for Third Eye Blind at the spring concert. April's concert will be the first major concert since Busta Rhymes played last spring.

BY JENNIFER JENCHURA
Senior Writer

Bucknell University's Concert Committee recently announced the performance of G. Love before Third Eye Blind takes the stage for the April 4 inaugural concert in Sojka Pavilion.

After seeking approval from Third Eye Blind, G. Love was confirmed over the weekend.

"The concert committee worked hard to make sure the first show in the pavilion was special for Bucknell students," Associate Dean of Students Kari Conrad said. "In the past some students have had the perception that the Concert Committee was trying to appease both the outside community and Bucknell students. Certainly it is nice when we have community support because we rely on them for ticket sales. The main priority, however, has always been to choose a group that Bucknell students like."

Between putting on last semester's Fall Fest, which featured two live bands on campus in an outdoor setting, and saving to put on a big spring concert in Sojka Pavilion, April's concert will mark the first major concert since Busta Rhymes played last spring in the Fieldhouse.

"The Concert Committee has all aspirations to also have a concert this upcoming fall as well. The Sojka Pavilion has a much better venue with better acoustics and seating," said Marty Pfinsgraff '03, co-concert committee chairman.

The Concert Committee began researching opening

Sorority sponsors rape forum

BY ELISABETH SALEMME

The sisters of Delta Delta Delta Sorority sponsored a rape forum intended to educate students about sexual assault at the University.

Dean and Judicial Advocate for Sexual Assault (JASA) Kari Conrad, Dean of Students Richard Ferraro and University Counsel Wayne Bromfield discussed the adjudication process for sexual assault at the University. They spoke about the institutional response to reported sexual assault, the process once the JASA is contacted, the Hearing Board on Sexual Assault (HBSA), the University standard of proof, relevancy issues during the trial and the appeals process. This information can be found in the Student Handbook.

"Most often sexual assault is reported to sexual assault advocates on campus. We have several on campus who will address the situation [and] will explain the sexual assault protocol," Conrad said.

Conrad spoke about the right of both parties to seek a member of the University to act as an adviser who assists either party in the judicial hearing board process.

"I encourage [both parties] to bring their adviser with them to all meetings and the advisers can schedule their own meetings if they have any additional questions," Conrad said.

Bromfield explained the University's preponderance of evidence standard of proof. According

Students and faculty celebrate Engineers Week

By M. Robert Ellis
News Editor

Last week the University's engineering department held its annual Engineers Week in which the different engineering disciplines compete in events and challenges.

National Engineers Week was founded in 1951 by the National Society of Professional Engineers.

According to the engineering week national Web site, National Engineers Week originally included a few scattered government proclamations, dinners and speeches. It has since grown to involve tens of thousands of engineers in a variety of community outreach activities, such as technology and education exhibits at shopping malls, to presentations of student scholarships.

"In the College of Engineering [at Bucknell] we like to hold a 'bragging rights' style competition where students and faculty can engage in fun and creative competitions between departments," Associate Dean of Engineering Karen Marosi said.

This year's Engineers Week included a banner contest, scavenger hunt, video contest, poetry challenge, snow sculpting and a logo competition. The week also had non-competitive events such as a career networking session, an alumni lunch with students and a dinner.

"The engineering department supports the activities of Engineers' Week as a way to celebrate all engineering disciplines, promote friendly competition amongst the five departments, as well as promote a sense of unity within each department as you work and compete in the projects and events throughout the week," said Michelle Beardslee '03, student coordinator of Engineers Week.

"It was such a thrill to socialize with past alum and faculty members outside the classroom. I look forward to doing the same at next year's Engineers Week."
—Justin Schwartz '04

Another goal of the week is to improve networking capabilities by working with the alumni association.

"The college also tries to coincide with the Bucknell Engineering Alumni Association, who are very interested in becoming more active with students and providing them with networking opportunities," Beardslee said.

Many students took the opportunity to associate with past alumni.

"It was such a thrill to socialize with past alum and faculty members outside the classroom. I look forward to doing the same at next year's Engineers Week," Justin Schwartz '04, president of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers.

The week concluded with the Engineers Week dinner attended by over 270 people.

"This was my first time attending the Engineers Week dinner. I was shocked on the outstanding attendance of the dinner," Swartz said.

At the dinner, Mark H. Ronald '63 was awarded the 2003 Distinguished Engineering Alumni Award. This award is given annually to an engineering alum who has distinguished him or herself through extraordinary commitment to the College of Engineering and the University, exemplary professional achievement or noteworthy contributions to society.

"This is a very prestigious award and it was very special to be able to include the granting of this award with the Engineering Week dinner. Mr. Ronald appreciated being named the recipient of the award and was really impressed with our sense of community and the efforts by the students," Marosi said.

The Golden Hammer Award was presented to the Electrical Engineering Department for being the overall points winner for the week.

acts at about the same time it pursued the headliner.

"There are a limited number of bands touring this spring. We wanted a band that would compliment Third Eye Blind and appeal to the greatest number of students," Pfinsgraff said. "We also wanted to make sure we had a strong opener for the inaugural concert in Sojka. The combination of G. Love and Third Eye make for an exciting bill that will appeal to the majority of students."

Billed as a "Special Guest" G. Love and Special Sauce is inspired by a variety of music such as jazz, hip-hop and classic rhythm and blues. They became a college favorite after the release of their self-titled debut album in 1994, which sold more then 250,000 copies without significant radio play. The band has toured extensively, playing clubs and colleges across the United States. Last September the band played at Crowbar near Penn State University.

"We are very sensitive to what Bucknell students want. The committee selected G. Love because it appeals to the college crowd," Conrad said.

Best known for bluesy, sing-along hits such as "Baby's Got Sauce," "Cold Beverage" and the Philadelphia Tribute, "I-76." Frontman G. Love, born Garrett Dutton, grew up in Philadelphia, singing on his hometown. Succeeding the band's 1994 debut album, "G. Love & Special Sauce," the band released "Coast to Coast Motel" in 1995, followed by "Yeah, It's That Easy" in 1997. Last March the band put out a greatest hits album, "The Best of G. Love and Special Sauce," after their 2001 release, "The Electric Mile," and "Philadelphonic" released in the summer of 1999.

"From the student surveys G. Love is well-liked at Bucknell so I imagine students will attend the band's performance," Conrad said.

Tickets are $25 for students for either standing or reserved seating and $35 for the general public. Approximately 2,000 tickets each of seating and standing room will go on sale for students March 17 and a week later for the general public. People wishing to purchase reserved seating tickets are encouraged to purchase with friends in order to guarantee seats together. The doors open at 8 p.m. and G. Love is set to take the stage at 9, followed by Third Eye Blind.

WASHINGTON—fewer children are showing high levels of lead in their blood or the effects of secondhand smoke, a government report has found—but childhood asthma rates are doubling. The Environmental Protection Agency report also found that one of every dozen women of childbearing age has blood mercury levels that could hinder brain development in a fetus.

Blair unveils global warming plan

LONDON—British Prime Minister Tony Blair announced ambitious plans Monday to combat global warming, saying the Kyoto treaty to reduce greenhouse gases did not go far enough and criticizing the United States for failing to back it. Blair vowed Britain would seek to reduce its emissions of harmful carbon dioxide by 60 percent by 2050 and said U.S. President George W. Bush was wrong to claim fighting warming will slow economic growth.

Glimmer of hope in AIDS drug trial

SAN FRANCISCO—An experimental AIDS vaccine does not appear to protect most whites and Hispanics from the disease but may show promise in protecting blacks and Asians, said VaxGen Inc., the company that makes the vaccine. NBC's Robert Bazell cautioned that the results showing possible protection among some racial groups were highly inconclusive and represented "a very small part of a study that was essentially negative."

Student appears on syndicated version of "The Weakest Link"

Katie Jordan '04 participated in the Greek edition of the popular game show

By Jason Oster
Staff Writer

Katie Jordan '04 had a lot to celebrate the night she found out she was selected to be a contestant on the syndicated version of "The Weakest Link." Originally, she tried out to be on the College Cheerleader Edition, but after passing the preliminary quiz over the phone and filling out her application, she was asked to be on the fraternity and sorority edition.

While other students might have taken road trips or gone home over their fall breaks in October, Katie was flown out to Los Angeles to try out for a spot on the nationally broadcasted show and to represent the University and her sorority.

"The studio paid for my plane tickets and hotel, which was right next to Universal Studios, and it was beautiful," Jordan said. The show flew over 40 students involved in Greek life from schools all over the nation. It was still not definite whether Jordan would be chosen to appear on the well-known game show and have the chance to win up to $100,000.

"I think I first started getting nervous when I had to interview with the producers, who would decide which people they actually wanted to be on the show," Jordan said. "After waiting in this backroom for hours, they finally called the six names of those who would be appearing on this first show, and my name was one of them."

Without any preparation, Jordan was taken from the backroom onto the soundstage where the game show is filmed.

"We picked our order at random, and just my luck, I was first," Jordan said.

Jordan was on a show with five other college students from around the country—Ola, Eric, Will, Lauren and Cliff. Eric and Will came from the South, as did Ola, who was representing Spellman College. Lauren was from the University of Arizona. Receiving the first question, Jordan was asked to name the 1939 film which had Dorothy and the Yellow Brick Road, to which she correctly answered "The Wizard of Oz." The next question was not as much a success for Jordan.

"For anyone who saw the show, they probably laughed at my answer to, 'What star in the Solar System takes 9 minutes to reach Earth?' to which I eventually replied, "Venus." And needless to say I was voted off first. Under the pressure and the quick speed of the game I forgot that the sun is a star, and since they don't allow you to say 'pass' or 'I don't know,' I had to say something," Jordan said.

"Even though I did not win, I'm happy with the way it turned out on TV. I was extremely lucky to be given such an awesome opportunity."
—Katie Jordan '04

For those who do not know how the game works, the players vote off the show the person who they believe is the weakest link. Stastically, the one voted off is not always actually the weakest link. This was unfortunately true in Jordan's case. Although Eric and Cliff did not answer any questions correctly, and were the real weakest links, three of the contestants voted off Katie.

"The only comfort I take is knowing that I actually was not the weakest link for the round—two of the other guys were statistically lower than me," Jordan said.

When most people think of "The Weakest Link," an obnoxious British lady spouting insults comes to mind. George Gray is the host in this syndicated edition. It was Gray who told Jordan, "You are the weakest link … goodbye."

"George Gray is a funny guy in real life. It seems like they only air his corny jokes, but off camera he had us cracking up the entire time," Jordan said. "He made a point to come meet us all and hang out for a little while."

Jordan got to know the other contestants prior to the taping of the show.

"Twenty of us were stuck in this backroom for what seemed like forever," Jordan said. "It was actually kind of funny because I think we all started getting crazy after the fifth or sixth hour and we still didn't know who would be picked for the show. We got to know a lot about each other while we waited and made plans to go out that night."

Jordan enjoyed meeting contestants from different cities and meeting such diverse and interesting people, which was different from her experience in Lewisburg and at the University.

"It was disappointing that we only had one day to spend together, because I would have loved to get to know them all more," Jordan said.

One of the best aspects of appearing on the show for Jordan was that she was able to represent both her sorority and the Universtiy.

"Even though I didn't win, I was still flattered to be picked for the show at all," Jordan said. "I think my sorority's nationals were originally concerned about how it would be edited and how the final product would make me look. And even though I did not win, I'm happy with the way it turned out on TV. I was extremely lucky to be given such an awesome opportunity."

Van Wagener '06 receives helpful software

By Meghan Fox
Staff Writer

As a demonstration of love and support for its fellow class member, the Class of 2006 used the proceeds of its Valentine's Dance to purchase voice activated software for David Van Wagener '06, who was paralyzed in a skiing accident over winter break.

The dance, held on Feb. 15, raised enough money to pay off the initial costs, and to purchase the Dragon Naturally Speaking Professional, the voice-activated software conducive to Van Wagener's progress.

"The dance was absolutely a success. Initially we were just going to have a dance because of demand, but we still came out and made a little bit of money, $20, on top of what we donated. Our goal was to buy David the software, and since we did that, and we didn't lose money, that in it of itself is a success. It also says a lot about the class, too," Secretary and Treasurer Joel Buckman '06 said.

> "My injury is a serious one. But, I am working hard at rehab, I remain optimistic about my longer-term outlook and I am seriously aiming to return to Bucknell in the fall."
> —David Van Wagener '06

The check for Dragon Naturally Speaking Professional was signed last Friday, and the software should be arriving soon to Van Wagener's room in Craig Hospital where he is currently carrying out his rehabilitation.

Since the accident, Van Wagener has been unable to use his fingers and has had to rely upon others to transcribe e-mails. With the new software, David will be able to respond to e-mails on his own.

"The basic idea of it is that David will be able to dictate words and phrases into a microphone, which will be translated into a word document or an e-mail. Basically, he has use of his computer and can function without having to use the fine motor skills of his hands," Buckman said.

Paul Wolujewicz, president of the Class of 2006, explained that the class officers were notified of the accident over break and immediately wanted to help out in every way possible. Many sent cards and care packages, but they hoped to aid Van Wagener in a more substantial way.

"We thought we wanted to do something a little more practical than just getting him stuff like DVDs," Wolujewicz said. "We wanted to get a big project together so that we could give him something worthwhile, and so that he would know we were really heartfelt about this and not just doing it out of an obligation. We wanted to show our support in the way that he deserves it."

In conversations with Van Wagener's father, Assistant Dean of Students Amy Badal learned that the voice-activated software was a necessary investment for Van Wagener's recuperation.

"This was something that his father had mentioned that he needed when we asked what we could do for him. This was one of his suggestions. I presented it to the officers, and the officers loved the idea," Badal said.

"We did it as a measure of support. Part of our job as class officers is to maintain class unity, especially when a tragedy like this occurs. Our goal was just to help out in any way possible and to unite the class around that cause. Any way to be supportive was what we were shooting for," Buckman said.

The Class of 2006 officers continue to send Van Wagener something every week to express continuous hope and support during his recovery.

"Thanks to everyone at Bucknell for your support and prayers over the past several weeks since my accident. The various cards and care packages, posters from the Class of '06 and Buck Wild, Valentine's Dance fundraiser and basketball game dedication all really boost my spirits a lot! And I am excited about the voice-activated software—it will be crucial to my studies and communication since I can currently move my arms pretty well, but not my hands," Van Wagener said.

Although rehabilitation is demanding and physically exhausting, Van Wagener continues to make progress and to maintain a positive attitude.

"My injury is a serious one. But, I am working hard at rehab, I remain optimistic about my longer-term outlook and I am seriously aiming to return to Bucknell in the fall. This, of course, assumes that my general health and my strength continue to progress. It also assumes that we can arrange the necessary support from nurses, the University, hospitals and friends. But I am grateful for how hard everyone is working along with me to make this happen," Van Wagener said.

Van Wagener continues to encounter new challenges in rehab and is currently learning to eat without the use of his fingers. His progress is updated on a regular basis on his Web site (www.dbdoctor.net/david), which also serves as a message board and a prayer page for Van Wagener.

"Please know that your support has meant more than you can even appreciate. I read each of the postings on the Web site and, while I am not yet in a position to respond to them, they really lift me up in my efforts to return next fall. Please keep those cards and Web postings coming!" Van Wagener said.

Anyone from the Bucknell community who would like to send Van Wagener a card or package may bring it to Badal's office, LC 211. The University will provide postage.

"David is so unbelievably motivated and it is so awesome to hear that news. We are eager for him to come back. We have high hopes and we are greatly excited for his return to Bucknell," Wolujeqitz said.

Daniel Flynn lectures on left-wing America

By Jeff Day
Staff Writer

Daniel Flynn, author of "Why the Left Hates America," lectured to a crowd of more than 90 students and faculty members Feb. 20. As a part of a lectureship group that is operated by the Young America's Foundation, Flynn passed up an opportunity to appear on "The Donohue Show" in order to speak at the University.

Flynn began his speech by stressing the important distinction between the "left" and "liberals/democrats." Flynn said that the left makes up no more than 10 percent of the population, but unfortunately has massive cultural influence through both entertainment and education.

"One institution in this country that the left certainly dominates is higher education," Flynn said. "The diversity of most administrations looks like the United Nations, but thinks like a San Francisco coffeehouse."

He emphasized that colleges shield people from a wide variety of opinions, and such campuses view diversity as a serious threat.

"We are all tolerant of ideas we agree with. The test of tolerance is to accept those views that don't agree with your own," Flynn said.

Much of his speech accentuated the topic of his book.

Flynn believes that the left unfairly compares America's culture to that of an ideal.

"Strive for ideals, but to hold America up to Utopia is an unfair basis for comparison," Flynn said.

Flynn said that much of the problem was a lack of understanding about U.S. history by leftists. This, accompanied by an even great misunderstanding of other nations' cultures further causes the left to despise American ways and means. While we [conservatives] see the stars and stripes he said, the left sees a sickle and hammer.

Unlike other nations that support honor killings, trial by ideal and place outrageous burdens on prosecutors in court proceedings, the United States is a much different culture.

"When you look at the good, the bad and the ugly, the U.S. looks pretty great," Flynn said. "I've never seen anyone getting shot going East over the Berlin Wall, and I've never seen anyone going to Miami and get in a raft to risk their life going to Cuba."

Instead, America is home to many inventions that have changed the course of history, including the airplane, space shuttle, lightbulb, Internet and computer, among countless other examples. The United States has donated over $600 billion to foreign countries since the end of World War II, and is home to 45 of the Medical Noble Prize winners in the last 60 years, Flynn said.

"When American ingenuity creates, everyone benefits," Flynn said.

Flynn concluded his speech by quoting Jean Kirkpatrick.

"American's need to face the truth about themselves, no matter how pleasant that truth is," Flynn said.

Denise Chaykun, president of the Bucknell University Conservatives Club (BUCC), expressed her approval of Flynn's speech.

"I was thrilled by our turnout and the people there seemed interested and he seemed to hold their attention," Chaykun said.

BUCC is working to bring several other speakers to campus. According to Chaykun, Ben Stein, Miss America and Executive Vice President of the NRA Wayne LaPierre are all candidates that BUCC hopes to be able to bring to campus.

include joint academic and student-life programming, assessing the current orientation program and modifying as appropriate, clearly explaining student-development expectations, continuing to implement both the 10-Point Plan to Reduce Alcohol Abuse and the Plan for Prominence in Fraternity and Sorority Affairs, and developing and implementing Long-Range Plans for Religious Life, Athletics and Recreations, and Career Development Center (CDC).

Pollock said that Issue 2: Personal Engagement will make sure that all students have the opportunity to feel connected to the University. To achieve this, the document calls for the strengthening of the Residential Colleges and possibly making a "vertical" Residential College that would continue for multiple years of housing options. It also calls for more student-faculty interaction socially, as in attending lectures or programs together outside of the classroom setting.

Issue 3: Diversity's Benefits to Learning discusses the importance of an educational process in which students are exposed to students with different backgrounds and thoughts.

"Diversity is a critical issue for providing the fullest possible education," Pollock said.

This section calls for mutual selection of mentors. Pollock differentiated between a mentor and an adviser. He said a mentor combines the role model, adviser, counselor and colleague.

"The mentor would end up being someone whose research a student is engaged. Rather than assigning an advisor to a student, be proactive to create situations and interaction that isn't always focused on a particular course—form a bond," Pollock said.

Initiatives under Issue 3 include enhancing Multicultural Affairs, International Student Services, LGBT Awareness, the Chaplains and Religious Life and the Women's Resource Center programming.

Issue 4 discusses leadership on campus and establishes the goal to "make students' preparation for leadership a hallmark of Bucknell, one actively supported by both student life and academic programs."

Pollock clarified that leadership as used in the document is not a specific role or position.

To promote leadership, the draft calls for an active student role in decision making, developing a leadership program and assisting with student-driven projects.

The last issue in the document is the importance of setting, which discusses the residential nature of the University and its role in the greater Lewisburg community. One proposal includes new student union building.

Aziz Megji '03 sits on the Student Life and Culture Task Force. He felt that the new student union was an important piece of student input that could be seen in the document.

"The student union initiative is a great step to providing increased interaction amongst diverse groups on campus, and providing a social outlet," Megji said.

University Chaplain and member of the Student Life and Culture Task Force Ian Oliver agrees with Megji that the possible student union building would be an asset to the campus.

"I am very excited about the Student Life and Culture's plans for a possible 'student union' building on campus. Having worked on campuses where there was a central building with open gathering places for students, a variety of social spaces and offices for student groups, I think this would be a great addition to our campus," Oliver said.

Megji was one of three students who served on the task force. Jessica Briski '04 and Abbey Seaboyer '04 both sat on the task force for a semester before going to study abroad. Pollock feels that the students gave valuable input during the drafting of the document.

Other members of the task force, including Dean of Students Richard Ferraro, agreed with Pollock.

"I appreciated the students' work, and I feel that they were very conscientious," Ferraro said.

Megji feels that the students were listened to and had input into the draft that was released, which can be seen in initiatives such as the student union, more diverse social offerings and incentives to encourage faculty involvement in student life.

> "It's been a process that has evolved over time—not just the substance of the plan, but the process itself. I think the task force has adapted well to changes in the process and has produced every bit as much as I had hoped for in terms of good vision for student life at Bucknell."
> —Charles Pollock '70, vice President of Student Affairs

The other members of the task force include Associate Dean of Students Gerald Commerford, Director of Career Development Laura Denbow, Associate Professor of Civil and Environmental Engineering, Director of Athletics John Hardt and Associate Professor of Education Joseph Murray.

The document released to the University community has already undergone some editing. BSG President Katy Timer '04 said that six individuals met, marked areas that needed improvement and brought suggestions before BSG. These students include Timer, Vice President of Administration Jen Pusty '05, Vice President of Finance John Gray '04, Vice President of Operations Jack Phillips '04, Senior Class President Laura Day and Duff Weber '05. BSG had been allotted four student seats at the Vision 2010 Meetings but Timer and Pusty were unable to make the meetings, so Day and Weber sat in to ensure that students received the full representation allowed them.

Timer said that BSG was successful in passing the changes they made.

"The most important thing is that we were able to make changes and get each one voted on and supported by BSG. Sixteen of the changes made were approved by congress," Timer said.

A highly debated topic is off-campus living. Vision 2010 calls for another survey regarding the conditions of downtown living in the next 2-3 years. It will gather both student and community opinions. The situation will be re-evaluated in 2006, according to Timer, and the last survey indicated that the situation had improved in the past two years.

"We would like the decision to go through BSG and have that support. We also put in a referendum to the whole student body so that it's not just a BSG decision, since students are able to answer whether or not they want to live downtown. This way the University will know how the students feel about the issue," Timer said.

Ferraro agreed that it was important to get student opinion on the issue and allayed the fears of students after hearing about the possible ending of off-campus living.

"The fear a lot of students have about being called back to campus is not going to eventuate, at least not in the near-term, and if things remained improved downtown, it may never happen," Ferraro said.

He did say that if students are to vote in a referendum about off-campus living, it would be important to have full disclosure of what other alternatives for housing would be available.

BSG has also added a request for a student voting member on the Board of Trustees. Timer said that this is not a new idea—it had come up a few years ago, but nothing had come of it.

"When we discussed the student affairs section, we felt it would be a good time and place to put it in. Most likely, the student would never change a vote, but it's important for the student's point of view to be represented on the Board of Trustees. The trustees really are interested in what students think," Timer said.

Rogers agrees with Timer and BSG.

"I've been at a place where there was a student on the Board of Trustees, and it seemed to work well. It was a good thing because the student perspective was available even behind closed doors, and it was good to have that voice when the board was voting," Rogers said.

Pollock also felt that the student voting member was a good idea. He said that this would require a rewriting of the University bylaws. It also raises some questions regarding other groups, such as the faculty, that also have interest at stake with the board's decisions.

Ferraro disagrees with a student voting member, preferring a non-voting student on the Board of Trustees.

"I personally think there is a lot to say for having a non-voting student member of the board. I think it would have a symbolic importance and promote student voices. It is consistent with the other processes the University follows in keeping students involved in decision making," Ferraro said.

Another request from BSG is to add a provision requiring the University to update technology, providing cable television to dorm rooms to keep students better aware of world events, and also to improve the swipe card system to include laundry, vending and copy machines. BSG feels this is a reasonable request, even more so because the swipe card system is scheduled to be redone in the summer 2004. Phillips said that these are improvements that will keep the University competitive.

"BSG is pushing hard for technological advancements. We are committed to pushing topics such as cable in dorm rooms and more robust swipe cards to the foreground in talks about Vision 2010," Phillips said.

BSG also made changes that affected the tone of the document. Timer and other students, comprising a mixture of both Greek and independent students, felt that there was a negative connotation surrounding the depiction of fraternities and sororities.

"While we would like to for the plan to expand outside the Greek system, it's important to recognize that the system is a big part of the University and to keep working on it, not to let it not be an important part of the University," Timer said.

Pollock, Rogers and Ferraro said that any wording that appeared to be anti-fraternity and sorority life was unintentional.

"The plan needs to be revisited with an ear for the tone," Pollock said. "The effort of the task force was to not avoid what needs to be altered as well as what needs to be maintained at the University. The Greek community has part in both. It was not the intent of the task force to include anything in this plan that is not in the Plan for Prominence in Fraternity and Sorority Affairs."

BSG also put in provisions about honor and speech codes.

"We made clarifications about an honor and speech code so that if changes are made, they don't come from the wording of the document because we were uncertain as to the meaning in the text," Timer said.

Ferraro and Pollock agreed that the University would strive for a balance between civility and freedom of speech.

"I've always believed that you have to reconcile freedom of speech with civility. The balance that you want to achieve, when the right combination is found, allows for free speech in its fullest," Ferraro said.

Pollock said that while an honor code was discussed during the drafting of the document, one is not placed in the text and there is no provision preventing an honor code from being developed.

"The Student Life and Culture Plan is neither calling for nor ruling out an honor code. It would be a possible manifestation of this objective of having students feel more responsible for one another and their conduct, reducing the degree to which the University regulates students. It's not necessary as a means of achieving it, but it is one possibility," Pollock said.

The draft is available on the Internet for students, faculty and staff to view. The task force would appreciate any feedback from individuals regarding changes or criticisms.

Pollock commends the task force for its hard work throughout the drafting process.

"It's been a process that has evolved over time—not just the substance of the plan, but the process itself. I think the task force has adapted well to changes in the process and has produced every bit as much as I had hoped for in terms of good vision for student life at Bucknell," Pollock said. "There's a great deal of material there for the bridging of the academic experience that students have and the student life experience, for creating a more seamless experience where learning doesn't occur in compartments."

of a catalyst than the cause for the deanery reviewing the issue," Senior Class President Laura Day said.

On Tuesday morning, the senior class officers met with administrators with a proposal to increase safety at Senior Nights. They proposal included reinforcing the rule of not allowing intoxicated students to take part in Senior Night and only allowing beer and bottled drinks to be served by the bars in order to ensure more moderate drinking.

Another option is to have a University employee work the event, instead of having only BSG representatives oversee Senior Night.

Dan Flatley '03 was checking identifications at the door when he noticed the student being supported by two friends. He then made the call for an ambulance to come at around 1 a.m.

"I'm proud with how Dan handled the situation. I feel that the student representatives handled the situation very maturely and with the utmost judgment," Day said. "I was proud that they placed the student's health as the No. 1 priority."

The counsel will decide by next week about the future of Senior Night. If it continues, the next event will be held March 20.

Senior Night is an event that normally takes place on Thursday nights from 10 p.m. to 2 a.m. Throughout the course of then evening, buses transport 375-500 seniors back and forth between the event and campus. Although there have been seven Senior Nights so far this year, the most recent one was the first requiring an ambulance call.

"It would be a shame to let the actions of one individual serve as a detriment to the whole class," Day said. "For the most part, Senior Night provides class spirit and camaraderie and if we could make Senior Night a moderate drinking experience, it should be allowed to continue."

President Rogers proposes plans for University's future

other than our own culture," Rogers said.

Bowen believes civic engagement is important because the University needs to prepare well-educated people who are able to help society meet the tremendous challenges ahead.

"Surveys show an increased interest in civic engagement. Students feel that they need to be engaged, but often report that they don't know how to get there. Higher education has the opportunity to meet this educational need, and I believe that no one can do it better," Bowen said.

Another area that this white paper seeks to improve is faculty courseloads. According to the paper, teaching loads need to be reduced to make more faculty time available for support of student learning using the best pedagogies, many of which are focused on faculty support of students outside traditional classroom environments.

Bowen thinks that the way the University teaches has already changed and evolved.

"There is no college or university anywhere that has better teaching than Bucknell," Bowen said. "What hasn't changed rapidly enough is the support for our faculty in sustaining that high level of accomplishment. We want to reduce the course load so faculty can spend more time with students."

George Exner, associate professor of mathematics and chair of the Committee on Instruction, feels a reduced course load is essential.

"If we expect to compete with other institutions, either in how we can teach or in our recruitment of faculty, we can't be that out of step in course load terms," Exner said. "But this reduction can't be oversold: it won't both relieve time pressures on faculty and simultaneously allow faculty to take on new tasks."

As an individual faculty member, Exner thinks that this plan lacks a clear statement that academics are centrally important at the University.

"Lots of good things happen at Bucknell that are educative. You probably fell in love here ... Perhaps you had leadership opportunities in one, or many, things. Perhaps you paid the consequences for procrastination. Probably you made lifelong friends," Exner said. "All of these are undoubtedly educative; are all of these things Bucknell's mission? ... And even if so, are all forms of education equally central to Bucknell's mission? No. There is only one thing we are really expert at: academic education."

Student Affairs Task Force Report

This white paper states that the "vision for student life and culture at the University has one overarching objective: that every student be deeply involved in his or her own education and personal development."

"The overarching idea is that of deep involvement in one's own education—personal, active engagement rather than the passive consumption of ideas," Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 said.

(See separate Student Affairs Task Force Report article on A1 for more detailed information.)

Enrollment Management Task Force Report

According to Vice President for Enrollment Management Kurt Thiede, the Enrollment Management Task Force Report supports what comes out of the academic and student life plans because they set the stage for the future of the University.

"We need to define what the institution values in students and then go out and recruit students who best represent those values," Thiede said.

In order to achieve these goals, Thiede finds it important to look at what the student marketplace will be like in the future.

One way that the University plans to accommodate the future is to increase the selectivity of the admissions process. For example, this year the University accepted approximately 39 percent of applicants. The goal is to decrease that to 30 percent by 2010.

"If we increase selectivity, we can stay competitive within the student marketplace. Greater selectivity will allow us to maintain a high level of student quality in those times when we might receive fewer applications for admission," Thiede said.

With increased selectivity, the University also looks to diversify the student body, particularly in the area of multicultural diversity. By 2010, the University aims to increase the racial diversity of the entire student body from 12 percent to 22 percent.

> "There is no college or University anywhere that has better teaching than Bucknell. What hasn't changed rapidly enough is the support for our faculty in sustaining that high level of accomplishment."
> —Stephen Bowen, provost/vice president for academic affairs*

Laura Day, Class of 2003 president and former Admissions intern, believes the Enrollement Management Task Force is a specific tactical approach to increasing diversity, especially multicultural diversity.

"I think this initiative is vital to the future success of Bucknell as a rural, residential, liberal arts institution. More specifically, increasing multicultural diversity on campus is crucial to the intellectual, cultural and emotional growth of students," Day said. "Employers also are increasingly looking to hire students with diverse backgrounds and educational experiences. Most importantly, in our post-Sept. 11 world, fostering not only tolerance but deeper levels of understanding, of diverse cultures, ethnicities and religions, is no longer a goal, but a necessity."

The University hopes to diversify the student body, and at the same time, it also wishes to increase the diversity of the faculty. According to Thiede, in order to increase diversity among students, the University needs a faculty and staff that is likewise diverse in many ways.

"If we are to increase diversity within Bucknell's workforce, we need to think beyond the traditional forms of faculty and staff recruitment and hiring. We need to identify students who have strong potential to develop professionally in higher education and find ways to nurture this interest—even to the point of developing support for their continued education and training in exchange for a commitment to work at Bucknell for a given amount of time," Thiede said.

Another goal expressed in this white paper is to "maximize the impact and influence of 'telling the Bucknell story' through a comprehensive and integrated plan of marketing communications and media relations."

According to Thiede, the University can improve this area by becoming more Web-centric in communications and telling the story in a less static way than it does now.

"It's important that prospective students when visiting the campus can grab a copy of The Bucknellian, along with a copy of The Counterweight, and gain an understanding of the discourse that takes place here; it's not just marketing pamphlets that are useful in communicating the story of the University," Thiede said.

This plan also looks at an increased retention rate: "Improvement in this area can only strengthen the institution's enrollment and increase the opportunities for greater ongoing alumni participation in the life of Bucknell."

"Until we are at a retention rate of 100 percent, I'm not going to be totally satisfied," Thiede said.

Finance and Administration Task Force Report

The main goal illustrated in this portion is "to assist all of the University's constituencies in providing stewardship of the University's resources."

This draft deals with the Division of Finance and Administration's specific areas of responsibility: Financial Services, Auxiliary Services, Personnel Services and Facilities. According to Interim Vice President of Finance and Administration David Surgala, each of these areas provide valuable support services to students, parents, faculty, staff, alumni and trustees. For example, Auxiliary Services impacts students daily.

"No day goes by without the campus community interacting with the Bookstore, Dining Services, RICS (scheduling), Purchasing or Administrative Services (the mailroom and printing operations)," Surgala said.

According to Surgala, the impact of both Personnel Services and Facilities can be long-term.

"Personnel Services is involved in staffing and career planning for the University's organization as well as administering the benefit programs for all participants. Facilities addresses daily issues such as snowstorms and routine maintenance, but also oversees new building construction and Bucknell's overall physical landscape," Surgala said.

Surgala also thinks the human resources aspect of this white paper is important.

"Any organization is first and foremost its people. While people need good and sustainable physical resources to assist them, it is the interaction of individuals that make the world interesting and hopefully better," Surgala said. "The prominence of Personnel Services and Human Resources in this white paper recognizes the importance of the contributions of the people associated with Bucknell and the need to pro-actively address issues that affect the lives of individuals associated with the University."

Professor of Geography and Environmental Studies Ben Marsh, who served on a Finance and Administration strategic subcommittee, questions what is missing from the document.

"There is no serious look at how we'll be paying the bills over the next decade without pricing out the good students whom we wish to serve," Marsh said.

Surgala notes that this current paper deals with the Division of Finance and Administration's departmental items and is not an overall "Bucknell University Strategic Financial Plan."

"The more overarching Financial Plan addressing all of Vision 2010 will be created over the summer as individual departmental efforts are clarified, intertwined and prioritized by the campus community," Surgala said.

University Relations Task Force

The University Relations Task Force part of Vision 2010 will be revealed to the campus community shortly.

According to Vice President for Development and University Relations Robert Kallin, this division has three main objectives: to enhance the University's reputation, to develop and strengthen lifelong relationships with our constituents (i.e. alumni, parents and friends) and to secure the resources needed to address immediate and future institutional priorities.

What's next?

Now that the white papers are released to the campus, the governance committees are waiting for responses from the campus community.

"There are huge challenges with doing any kind of institutional planning in which you want every constituency to be represented and play a role. A particular challenge is that every group has high aspirations for Bucknell. We have worked hard to create a campus-wide discussion in which ideas from each constituency are heard and considered. From that pool of ideas, we have to assemble a coherent plan that reflects our shared aspirations and effectively helps us focus on shared goals and priorities," Bowen said.

"I encourage both parties to go to their parents for support. This is not an easy process for either party or the HBSA. These hearings can be 5 to 29 hours and at the end of the day the HBSA has to make a decision. It is very important that this process is fair to everyone," Conrad said.

Ferraro spoke about expulsion from the University.

"A person who commits rape breaks a contract with the community and we require them to be removed from the University," Ferraro said. "Expulsion is not easy or nice. I know leaving is not pleasant but Bucknell follows a punitive policy, so persons required to leave can transfer. The whole idea is that this is an educational process, not a legal process."

The information session presented by Conrad, Ferraro and Bromfield was followed by a question and answer session for students.

One student asked why there is not a resource center for men on campus. Ferraro said this is a possibility that is being looked at for next year.

Following the question and answer session, Interim Director of the Women's Resource Center Mary Snyder, graduate student Katie Parker and Public Safety Officer Don Wirick spoke about the One in Four program at the University.

The One in Four program's video was also presented, which was about men and sexual assault. The video is presented to allow men to feel empathy for those who are sexually assaulted.

"We don't as men, as a role, consciously think about being sexually assaulted. It is not part of our culture to be concerned about this. As a result, we have a hard time finding empathy," Wirick said.

mage against Bloomsburg University. As they were carrying it, the cage somehow moved and fell on top of Porter and Sarnecky, pinning them to the ground and breaking Porter's femur and Sarnecky's vertebrae. The coaches and on-site trainers immediately contacted the appropriate emergency resources and the two were rushed to the hospital.

The reason for the collapse of the cage is unknown.

"The piece of equipment involved in this unfortunate accident has been used safely without incident by the athletics and recreation program since 1989," Hardt said. "This is the first time any accident or injury involving the equipment has occurred."

Teammates of Porter and Sarnecky have come together and given their support during the trying time.

"I couldn't have asked for anything better," Sarnecky said. "They were all there in the hospital with me and they brought dinner to my family. I'm so thankful for their help."

The University echoes the players' sentiments in offering the women a healthy recovery.

"This accident is deeply troubling to all of us in the department and particularly to the coaches and teammates of the two injured athletes," Hardt said. "At this time, we all continue our efforts to reach out and support the injured athletes and their families."

The softball team must now find a way to persevere despite the loss of star pitcher, Porter, and outfielder, Sarnecky. The season will officially begin after spring break.

"It's taking us awhile to get into playing again," shortstop Jenny Ross '05 said. "But we've been getting a lot better every day. Being friends off the field really helps us with dealing with this."

Softball is not the primary concern of the team right now, as the players just want to see a good recovery for their teammates.

> "Everyone has bonded together in a really positive way. We've really come together as a team to give them our support."

Stackhouse '04 said. "We've really come together as a team to give them our support."

Sarnecky hopes that the doctor will allow her to travel during spring break to Florida, where the team will be preparing for the upcoming season. Although she won't be able to play, she has remained optimistic.

"It's disappointing that I'm going to miss my first year," she said. "But at least I'm going to be able to play in the future."

The Bucknellian Editorial

History 101: learning from the past to prepare for the future

More than two years after University President Steffen Rogers' inaugural address to the University, the first indication that his strategic plan, entitled Vision 2010, was well on its way to fruition came with the recent release of the Vision 2010 white papers.

The primary drafts of the academic affairs, student affairs, finance and administration and enrollment management documents have been released for public consumption with the hope that the University community will provide feedback and suggestions for constructive change. The University relations document is expected to be completed within a week.

The strategic planning process is not a new undertaking for the University. In 1990, under former University President Gary Sojka, the Trustee Implementation Planning (TIP) initiative focused itself on five aspects of student life: changes in the Greek system, residential changes, social changes, the first-year student experience and the residency requirement.

The TIP steering task force was composed largely of students and led by the executive officers of the Bucknell Student Government, resulting in dissent among faculty members who believed that such a undertaking was beyond the scope of the abilities of students.

According to earlier Bucknellian articles, fewer than 10 faculty members attended a TIP task force workshop that 83 members of the community attended.

Despite the doubts of faculty, many of the goals outlined by the TIP task force were implemented and continue to benefit student life at the University more than a decade later. These include establishing a formal rush for Greek organizations during sophomore year and renovating the Old Bison into a social activities center (currently the 7th Street Café, the Craft Center and the Niche).

In a 1990 Bucknellian article, Sojka described the TIP task force as "an extraordinary opportunity ... an opportunity not to get by, not to smooth things out, not to take care of business ... but an opportunity to make Bucknell a university for other universities to emulate."

In fact, other national universities aiming to model the social and residential programs that the University implemented studied the final TIP document.

Now, the University is once again trying to plan for the future, only on a much larger scale, by including all aspects of University life. The administration and task forces are once again giving students the opportunity to actively contribute to the future of the University, but, according to Rogers, he has received Vision 2010 input from various student groups, but little from individuals.

Without student participation on the TIP task force and steering committee, many aspects of student life that we take advantage of daily would not exist. Students who dedicated their time to the TIP task force knew that they would not likely experience the implementation of their efforts as undergraduates of the University, but they gave their time and ideas to enhance the University experience for future students.

We, as students, are currently in the same position. The University administration is asking for our input on Vision 2010, and although we may no longer be students at the University when the plan is fully implemented, we will still return to campus for Homecoming, class reunions and maybe even to show our children the campus. We have reaped the benefits of the efforts of those students who have gone before us, and now it is up to us to similarly give to future students of the University by engaging in the Vision 2010 revision process.

Complexity escapes petitioners

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to the Bucknell Conservatives Club's recent efforts to urge University President Steffen Rogers and Chief Financial Officer David Surgala to stop supporting terrorist nations. In its farfetched petition, which it distributed around campus, the club described how the University administration is supporting terrorism by holding stocks in companies that "have corporate ties to U.S. State Department-designated terrorist sponsoring nations." The signatories also agreed that they strongly believed that these investments enabled the governments of these countries to "provide safe haven, training facilities, communications, and information technology infrastructure, weapons, political cover and funding for [terrorist groups]." First of all, who on the University campus has enough information to make that assumption? Even the national government could not prove that these states were deliberately heading terrorist organizations.

Secondly, the petition provides no definition for corporate ties. As stated in the petition, it seems that every corporation in our country would somehow have ties to countries known to harbor terrorists. Iraq, for example, is a member of OPEC, from which we obtain oil. Certainly, there are no corporations that do not use energy. Under this logic, should not the University also discontinue the use of energy so as to be ethical? Surely the members of the Conservatives Club would not want give up most of the benefits of modern technology.

I do not support terrorism, nor do I want to, in any way, facilitate its existence. However, the fact stands that our world is vastly interconnected, making it impossible to initiate any kind of economic boycott on firms in which the University endowment is invested. I also believe that the Conservatives Club used emotional rhetoric to convince students to sign this petition without providing any sufficient arguments in its support. An e-mail sent out by the club made the claim in large bold letters that students could "help stop terrorism by signing [this petition]."

Let us, as Americans, continue the war on terrorism. But, let us do so with educated decisions and rational methods. Maybe the Conservatives Club can come up with another way to stop terrorism whose goal is not simply to make the University administration look bad, but rather to actually help bring about an end to this horrible cause.

Sincerely,
David Seal '06

Student's insight into "women-only spaces"

To the Editor:

The recent editorial on women-only spaces was insightful, intelligent and eloquent. Both authors were well spoken and sincere. However, I was surprised to see a piece on women-only spaces that failed to deal with the opinion of anyone who had ever actually been in such a space. So I figured I'd throw in my two cents.

Empowerment through community is one of the most valuable tools used in feminist consciousness raising efforts. When men are present, however supportive and wonderful they may be, female energy will be directed towards the male. I've seen it happen far too many times. It has nothing to do with individuals—it's simply how we've been taught to behave. I have every hope that we will come to the point at which women-only spaces will be unnecessary and inappropriate, but we have pretty far to go before that's a reality. At this point, women-only spaces represent a level playing field. Women can learn about each other. Support each other. Celebrate their bodies together. Women-only spaces allow women to explore their places in the feminist movement in an atmosphere that is designed to foster the free exchange of ideas by removing the social implications of gender.

I'm not supporting gender segregation. I don't think that classrooms should be divided. I don't think that male and female communities are by their nature mutually exclusive. Men and women should be able to do anything and everything together, but at this point in our cultural evolution men and women need a little time apart to deconstruct the ways in which gender influences behavior.

In my idea of a perfect world, there will be no need to consider gender. People will love who they love, they'll talk with whomever they wish about whatever they wish, they'll think fantastic new ideas and express these ideas without fear. They'll love free and die fulfilled. There will be no need to consider gender because it will not exist the way it does for us now. But until then, women need time together away from the inescapable and invisible rules of gendered interaction. We need to hold each other up. Only when a woman's desire to be alone is fully and profoundly respected will we see any kind of realization of a feminist vision that liberates men and women from harmful patriarchal structures.

Sincerely,
Liisa Britt '04

Women supporting women

To the Editor:

I'm extremely encouraged by the campus discussion about sexual assault and women's only spaces. However, I am discouraged that anyone on campus, let alone a representative of the Women's Resource Center, has given credence to any claim of men being falsely accused of rape. This acknowledgement, expressed in last week's issue of The Bucknellian as, "Even though there's a concern for false accusations ..." suggests an underlying prejudice against women and a misogynist, antifeminist approach toward victim advocacy. It is the primary obligation of feminist advocates to consistently denounce such claims and to be concerned only with believing the survivor. Acknowledging these claims, in any way, is antifeminist and harmful to women.

Reducing antiviolence work to victim advocacy and appeals to the humanity of men cannot effect the elimination of sexist violence.

It is probable that men who make these claims sincerely believe that a rape hasn't occurred. This is evidenced by virtually all of the studies on the topic of sexual assault. An alarming number of men in our culture believe that many types of offensive behavior, including those legally and morally defined as sexual assault, are normal and acceptable. Do these perceptions mean they are innocent? No! This ubiquitous sense of male entitlement means that advocates must be even more uncompromising and insistent that victims are always believed. Women are not a class of vindictive revenge-seekers. Reporting rape is extremely difficult! It becomes impossible when "feminists" give legitimacy to claims of false accusation.

The undermining of feminism and the antiviolence movement comes, not as much from its opposition, but from the influence that opposition has on the movement itself. To rid ourselves of dominant, reactionary modes of thinking must be a priority. Many say, "Rape won't stop until men stop raping." True! This statement puts the responsibility where it belongs. However, it denies the reality of institutional and systematic oppression. Men won't stop raping until women are no longer oppressed! Reducing antiviolence work to victim advocacy and appeals to the humanity of men cannot effect the elimination of sexist violence. Even so, some well-intentioned men (and women) call for the renaissance of male chivalry (i.e. an expression of paternal male dominance).

Only an autonomous movement of women, with a clearly focused leadership and agenda, can overturn patriarchy. Autonomy isn't simply, as Phil Martoma asserts, a "shelter from the forces which disadvantage [women]." Autonomy is a catalyst for developing our own power and experience. It is a prerequisite for women's liberation, ending oppression—and ultimately—for ending violence.

Professor Watson responds to student's letter to the editor

To the Editor:

Brian Bialas '04 accused me of calling Secretary of State Colin Powell a "slave" during my presentation at the Feb. 13 campus forum on Iraq. Here is what I read from my prepared text:

"Based on the findings of UNSCOM (United Nations Special Committee) it would be hard to believe the assertions Powell made at the U.N. Powell symbolizes how the culture of oppression can instill in certain victims of racial oppression a propensity to lie for motives that are grounded in infamy when the price is right. Powell is following the biddnig of his master."

It does not surprise me that Bialas finds "Watson's words are racist pure and simple." My understanding of the fact that racism helps me to understand why Bialas equates the term "master" to "racial epithets" in a relationship between a white president and a black secretary of state. Of course, the term master implies a relationship of inequality such as master-slave, master-servant and master journeyman-apprentice. Are not all members of George Bush's Cabinet his subordinates?

Perhaps I am guilty of disturbing the multicultural, pluralistic, democratic culture that Bialas embraces. Apparently, I don't appreciate that Powell symbolizes the end of racial hierarchy and the realization of multicultural diversity. Surely, it must be beneath the dignity of a professor who meets the "standard required of a Bucknell faculty member" to exhume the ghost of the master-slave relationship that was interred when the last nail was driven into the coffin of racism!

Bialas asks, "Would he have used the same characterization if a black secretary of state working in the Clinton Administration were to present the same evidence. I think not." Bialas deciphers my political sympathies for the Democratic Party by deconstructing the term master and my criticism of Powell. A black professor who criticizes Bush and Powell must be a racist and to boot a Clinton Democrat!

Bialas' logic exposes the cultural basis of his racialized normative assumptions. I think this has to be the basis of his eagerness to connect the quality of my intellect to race. The reality of the contemporary "cultural wars" in the West reveals a growing convergence between the discourse of race (scientific racism) and the neo-liberal discourse of culture. Should I expect Bialas to go against the grain?

Forum failed to give all perspectives

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

Walking into the recent forum on Iraq, I was immediately confronted with a packed auditorium that overflowed into the aisles and the back. It was good to see such a large number of students who were clearly interested in learning more about the issues at hand. I was not pleased, though, when the forum ended up being an embodiment of everything wrong with higher education today. Instead of different ideas being presented and debated, it was merely a venue where professors were able to preach their thoughts free from any fear of a possible intellectual challenge. The students, consequently, lost out on what could have been a unique opportunity.

It seems very difficult to hold a pro-war stance on campus. Not many professors will espouse such militaristic perspectives in class—if any such "hawkish" opinions actually surface, it tends to be the fruition of a student's input. So far, our University-sponsored forum, which should have presented a variety of stances that transcended both sides of the political spectrum, instead played host to an assortment of anti-war perspectives. Students may find it difficult to watch U.S. President George W. Bush's speeches when most do not have cable. In short, students that have come to adopt pro-Iraq liberation beliefs should be commended, as they're seemingly running against the grain, and most likely formulated their opinions as a product of research done on their own time.

For those who were not in attendance, allow me to briefly summarize. Associate Professor of Political Science Tansa Massoud was the first presenter. He began by explaining the choices were between regime change and containment. He preferred containment. Massoud feels that the United States could not properly handle regime change, that a new government may actually be harmful and that containment was preferable. Massoud, at one point, falsely asserted that Iraqi President Saddam Hussein had never used his weapons of mass destruction in an offensive manner.

Professor of International Relations Hilbourne Watson then gave a more militant Marxist perspective, which essentially illustrated his opinion that this was just a small step in a much larger strategy of American global dominance. (It is of interest that Watson echoed Harry Belafonte's attitude that U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell was a product of racism and oppression; consequently he was now a slave to his master-assumingly because he did not share Watson's political beliefs. While I support his right to say such things, it's discouraging Watson makes narrow-minded racial charges merely because of a difference in opinion.)

Even professors who most people assumed would deliver pro-Bush administration speeches, were instead wobbly, unsure as to the proper course. While they seemed to understand many of the reasons why war was a necessary evil, such ideas were unable to trump the queasiness over dead Americans. The abandonment of the ideal forum—where ideas would be presented concisely and challenged with opposing thoughts-was solidified as all three professors went almost doubled their allotted time.

Students who wanted to hear some Bush administration cheap shots (e.g. "Bush's daddy" and the allusion to him being Powell's puppet master) left quite delighted. Those who had sought to learn more about both sides of the story should have been told to stay home and not waste their time. For the latter type, the rest of this article is for you.

I have been hearing from professors as well as reading in The New York Times editorial pages that containment has been and will continue to be effective, which renders military action unnecessary. These people clearly don't understand the nature of this conflict; containment has never been the objective and there's no reason why it should now become the objective. Perhaps some reflection is due.

Hussein came to power in 1979 and shortly after ended his country's negotiated peace with Iran, claiming to own the rights of the river that divides them. This soon resulted in full-scale war, which did not end until 1998, and an estimated one million lives later. Two years later, Hussein decided to invade Kuwait, which he claimed was a part of Iraq (Kuwait had been an Iraqi ally during the previous conflict). After a U.S. led countermeasure with U.N. blessing, Iraqi forces were removed from Kuwait in only six weeks. As Bush said in his recent State of the Union Address, instead of Hussein being the final casualty of that war, he accepted the terms of several U.N. resolutions that were intended to keep his conquering impulses at bay. He obeyed zero of these. Planes enforcing the "no fly zones" were fired upon hundreds of times. Rather than disarm, he instead built up his weapons of mass destruction supply clandestinely, adopting a program of deception. Inspectors were harassed and not treated accommodatingly, until they were finally officially kicked out in 1998. At this point, he also called for an end to the economic sanctions that had been imposed upon his regime. Throughout this decade-long fiasco, if there was one lesson to be learned, it should be that neither diplomacy (which Kofi Annan attempted in '98), sanctions, aid (the food for oil program) or even selective military strikes (by Clinton in 1998) were effective in keeping Hussein down. While the Clinton administration and U.N.'s rhetoric both expressed policies of seriousness in seeing these accords strictly enforced, the actual policies exhibited more of a desire to sweep the whole issue under the rug.

Bush was the first to make clear it was no longer acceptable for these blatant violations of international law to continue unabated, which is, remember, a very dangerous thing. If the United Nations would not back up its own resolutions, America would. Resolution 1441 was passed unanimously by the Security Council, which demanded an active disarmament with thorough inspections. These inspections, by everyone's account—including U.N. Chief Weapons Inspector Hans Blix's—failed. Up to the culmination of the Persian Gulf War, Hussein had not been trying to conquer more territory for two and a half of his 13-year reign.

It is sometimes hard to take most of the anti-war movement seriously; the campaign seems more hell-bent on attacking Bush as a war mongering cowboy rather than achieving peace—if they truly wanted a peaceful solution, they'd be making demands of Hussein, and not just Bush. If they honestly believe greedy oil interests underscored Bush's motivations, I have two questions: Why did we not take over their oil fields after the Persian Gulf War? And, what ever happened to that much-rumored oil pipeline in Afghanistan? As Professor of History Martin Sklar would tell-you, the United States did not formerly commandeer Iraq's oil because we want Iraq to have money, create a stable economy and modernize.

For those claiming this will only destabilize the region, I ask, how could it get any worse? Sometimes I just want to magically transplant some of these anti-war activists from the safe halls of academia to the hellish cities of Iraq, where a sense of doom pervades life, and the only hope of betterment comes at the hands of the American military. Unfortunately, this only partially covers the reasons why most of the peace activists are wrong—I'll have to put off the positives of military intervention for a later piece.

As has been recently observed by moral theorists suggesting this situation complies with Just War Theory, war itself has become so lost as an abstract image of Total Evil that it has consequently lost its meaning as instrument in international judicial analysis. It's in fact quite responsible to think about the possible devastating effects of doing nothing, rather than simply the unavoidable repercussions of military action itself.

Vision 2010 suffers from acute myopia

By Nicole Wiederspiel
Writer

Have you had the time or desire to read the University's Vision 2010? I did. After immersing myself knee-deep in rhetoric and illusions, here is my psychoanalysis of a few parts of the document.

The University is an excellent school, located in the scenic Susquehanna Valley. We are diverse—we have a few people who have the courage to admit they are gay and one student from Mississippi. Lest you think this mission statement suggests sweeping change, we would like to assure you that sweeping change is not necessary. That would be radical, and we all know the dangers of that.

We are a vibrant community where the arts and culture come first. As you can see by our recent construction projects, such as O'Leary or the Sojka Pavilion, arts are our priority. Alumni play a large role in the University—they give us money, which we use cautiously and prudently. After all, figureheads need six figures—it's only fair, and you will surely agree that all garages need air conditioning. We will promote justice for all, although we will carefully choose who receives that privilege. We live in an era of rapid globalization, and we will respond to global crises with our oft-professed commitment to social justice, and our graduates will save the world as a result of our tutelage in the justice arts. We promote social responsibility, and our large level of involvement in such organizations is solid proof of that. We are compassionate—this year we added a conveyor belt to take students' trays away from the caf—now employees don't have to pick them up! We will provide a balanced social life—we will have fraternities and sororities. We will welcome a climate of diverse ideas, as long as they are politically correct and not too radical. Keep your affection for reds to yourself. We are hoping that the Living Wage Campaign will go away, but we plan to ignore it until it does.

We hereby announce an environmental conscience. We will use less Styrofoam, as this will make us stewards of the lovely Susquehanna Valley region. We are very rich (but could be more so) and we plan to eventually buy new land once we destroy this fine piece of real estate we have right here. We won't mention your SUVs that your parents bought you, students—that would be hypocritical, we drive them, too.

We will provide state-of-the-art technology, so good and so advanced that nobody will know how to use it. But that's OK, we have wireless.

We are a community, where everyone knows each other's name, although I am too busy writing this to know yours. We are well-respected by the "outside" community—after all, rural townies add to our diversity and tolerance.

As you can see, we are a wonderful school, and everyone knows it. These goals must be accomplished, so I am sure you will understand when we raise tuition a few percentages every year until 2010. We were founded by the Baptists, and their vision of ethnic, religious and racial homogeneity will be realized. We all share common values; we know this because we know you personally. We are here to nurture your spiritual growth and make you a better person, as our Judeo-Christian values clearly indicate. The University is united for this cause—and your unity is exemplified by your en masse subscriptions to the J.Crew catalogue. With dedication and your money we can make this vision possible, and remember this is not sweeping change—we are nearly perfect as it is.

Bush's actions fail to match his rhetoric

By Erin Switzer
Writer

If you were disappointed that you failed to see U.S. President George W. Bush's State of the Union Address, you can rest assured that you missed nothing more than an oration filled with pointless rhetoric. After examining the speech it is easy to see that it was nothing more than a collection of futile professions, aimed to divert attention away from the deeper issues most Americans really wanted addressed. The speech began with a rather elaborate listing of our accomplishments as a nation over the past four months. Among other examples, the president cited saving the world from thousands of terrorists, destroying Afghanistan's training camps and saving a people from starvation, giving the impression that we have been a magnificent humanitarian power of a world that has never experienced the damaging repercussions of our foreign policy.

"America and Afghanistan are now allies against terror. We will be partners in rebuilding that country," Bush said. Considering that not a single house of the 78,000 destroyed in Afghanistan has been rebuilt with international aid, leaving half a million returning refugees and urban poor in Kabul homeless, makes Bush's statement seem quite inaccurate. Thirty-two hundred families were living in the open in Kabul last summer and 1,400 families were squatting in public buildings, school dormitories, ministry buildings and offices, as reported by a chief technical adviser at the U.N. Habitat to The New York Times.

Bush continued, integrating a series of anecdotes of loved ones lost to terrorism that aimed to give a poignant touch to his conviction that our actions are just. Presumably, we would be naive to believe Bush's claim that "we are winning the war on terror" when North Korea has begun its drive towards not only arming itself but sharing either its weapons or technology with Pakistan, Yemen and Iran. Meanwhile, the White House's carefree attitude with regards to the threat posed by North Korea has been accompanied by an effort to keep the nation focused on Iraq, and, in recent events, they failed to alert the public of satellite images that revealed North Korea's attempt to reprocess plutonium. In addition to its standing army of 1,000,000 troops, North Korea has the potential to produce missiles that could threaten South Korea and Japan, while a missile currently in development could reach Alaska and the westernmost Hawaiian islands. The simple fact is that Bush is leading an attack on Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's nuclear arsenal (words he periodically has trouble pronouncing) that has not been proven to exist, while refusing military action to destroy the one suspected at Pyongyang. While Iraq has permitted inspectors access to nuclear sites, North Korea has continually kept secret its nuclear programs, violated agreements and restricted inspectors' access to strategic areas.

Bush's conviction that the conflict in North Korea can be resolved diplomatically seems unconvincingly optimistic. How can we have confidence in his assertions that our country has been not only successful, but justified in its actions, while tapes from Osama bin Laden continue to filter in and efforts to gain unilateral support for a war with Iraq remain unsuccessful? It is hard to think anything other than that this war has just begun—that there are not, nor will be, any "winners" in this war. As a nation we have fueled a sentiment among the unstable governments of less powerful nations that they must build weapons of mass destruction. While, at the same time, our presence has perpetuated a competitive race to see who can produce them the fastest or, in most cases, who can be the first to obtain necessary ingredients on the black market.

Although Bush acknowledges the growing danger of a myriad of terrorist states, he beats around the bush on many issues in his speech. This becomes one of the major faults of his speech. "America will do what is necessary to ensure our nation's security," he proclaims. Besides a budget that "includes the largest increase in defense spending in two decades," something about which we should be wary boasting, Bush fails to address what the imminent war on Iraq will mean. He should have focused more attention on the economic implications for our country after we foot the bill for reconstruction, or if we are indeed prepared and devoted to fully transform a country that has been damaged by a militant zealot, and if this demanding task is even in our jurisdiction.

Bush also fails to address the fears of the family members of troops waiting to be deployed into a country whose capabilities we seem to be quite ambiguous about. Additionally, Bush neglects to propose any plans to reduce our dependence on foreign oil or provide even the simplest incentive to Americans to purchase more environmentally-friendly cars. He gets surprisingly creative at times with figures of speech that depict terrorists "spread throughout the world like ticking time bombs, set to go off without warning." But these artistic tactics do little to strengthen Bush's attempt at a cogent speech. His address became a culmination of bold proclamations in which he avoided the challenge of exposing plans to help accomplish intended goals.

As if his speech could not become any more disappointing, we are lectured on the supposed benefits of his $670 billion tax break. He acknowledges the $30 million a day spent to fight the "war on terror" and goes further to outline his budget to increase defense spending, proclaiming, "Whatever it costs to defend our country, we will pay." Any basic level economics class teaches that if defense spending increases simultaneously as taxes are reduced, a crippling budgetary deficit from which it results is difficult to recover results. Bush claims to want economic security for Americans but admits needing to run a small deficit that he intends will be "short-term so long as Congress restrains spending and acts in a fiscally responsible way." Once again, a futile statement of vague objectives that fails to indicate the practices he will implement to ensure we avoid too much spending beyond our means. Bush intends to run the deficit for the purpose of accomplishing his objectives "to win the war, protect the homeland and revitalize our economy."

Unrealistically, he intends to be the James Bond-type leader who catches the culprit and defuses the bomb in 10 seconds. Does Bush have superhuman powers we are unaware of? It is not solely that his tax plan benefits the wealthy and big business while undermining the middle class, but that the government will be receiving $670 billion less over the next 10 years. We can only envision that our economy will look similar to the way it did after former President George H. W. Bush left office—a debacle. He attempts to disguise the tax cuts that are commonly perceived to be primarily for the wealthy with a $400-per-child rebate and a tripling of the amount small businesses can write off annually for equipment purchases.

Bush does gain a lot of points in terms of the consistency of his contradictory remarks. At one point he remarks, "... To help Americans plan for the future, let's make these tax cuts permanent," but it is then questionable whether in a matter of years an economic recession with an astronomical budget deficit will result. He goes on to say that the tax cut will allow Americans more money to spend, alleviating the current recession. Only a few minutes later, Bush notes that after Sept. 11, "We began to think less of the goods we can accumulate and more about the good we can do." Really? So why would we grant tax cuts to our already consumer-obsessed population so that they can buy even more superfluous paraphernalia? And finally, "We want to be a nation that serves goals larger than self." Ironically, we have exhibited this by pursuing a war against Iraq and building up our arsenal so that no other nation can compete. A speech so unconvincing as this one with an agenda that promotes a severely mismanaged economy and regards military muscularity as a priority, from a man who supports the National Rifle Association and spoke at a university that prohibits inter-racial dating—not surprising!

Implications of a U.N. ovation

By Mike Niebauer
Senior Writer

A majority of the membership of the usually quiet and reserved general assembly session of the United Nations gave the French Foreign Minister a rousing ovation. This was after the minister gave an eloquent and rational case for continuing the arms inspection program in Iraq. Even before Chief U.N. Weapons Inspector Hans Blix gave his report on the inspections program, the Bush White House was in urgent meetings concerning the military buildup in the Persian Gulf. According to BBC reports, that buildup will have the United States and its coalition of countries ready to proceed by mid-March.

The enthusiastic applause for the French minister and an ambiguous report from Blix may force the determined military advisers in the White House to urge the president not to trust in the U.N. resolution process. The overwhelming response from the General Assembly could work against any peaceful outcome at this point. Time and hope for a peaceful solution are quickly running out.

The hope of the White House is to bring about a democracy in Iraq. In a New Yorker article, Nicholas Lemann states that the White House's optimistic scenario is too rosy. "Democracy is a wonderful idea, but none of the countries in the Middle East, except Israel and Turkey, resemble anything that would look like a democracy to Americans," Lemann said. The fragility of the region is only one of many political variables that could ruin whatever U.S. plans exist to install a democracy in Iraq.

How will Saudi Arabia respond to a democratic Iraq as its neighbor? What are the social, political and economic implications of this on the religious fundamentalist clergy of Saudi Arabia and the frustrated youthful population of the House of Saud? These questions and others are not openly discussed in the run up to the oncoming war because the answers are unknowable. Perhaps ideas expressed in these questions and others in the months to come can explain the ovation for the French foreign minister. The seeming discomfort of many in the world with the U.S. obsession with the Iraqi regime change can be explained by the work of a strategist working in Washington.

David Wurmser, a State Department senior official, paints a fearful and sobering picture. Wurmser predicts "bringing down Saddam would have the effect of destabilizing both Syria and Iran." Wurmser is clearly convinced that after Iraqi regime change all these experimental political dominoes will fall in the way he predicts. The Bush administration shows the determination necessary to attempt this plan.

I am reminded of Professor of International Relations Hilbourne Watson's talk at the Iraq political seminar in Rooke. He mentioned that Iraq might be a test that may prove that the national sovereignty of nations may be a thing of the past. Capitalist accumulation and corporate globalization are the reasons and goals of this test. We may be witnessing a reworking of the international global trading system where global capitalism is independent of, if not superior to, the national governments of nations. If this works through the U.S.-inspired pre-emptive strike in Iraq, it could signal that individual national economic and political independence is effectively irrelevant since Iraq has not attacked any nation in this instance. Independent sovereign nations will no longer be whole or functional as in the past because their sovereignty will be compromised. The rules of the international environment would be altered; possibly causing unpredictable amounts of international instability.

It is amazing just how little debate there is in this democracy over the long-term goals or the post-Saddam occupation details in store after the upcoming incursion into Iraq. How easily we decline to debate these strategies and their far-reaching implications in our own democracy. If Wurmser's plans are ready for implementation there is still a lot to talk about.

U.S. role in Philippine conflict debated

Courtesy of Reuters

U.S. military advisers arrive at the Zamboanga Airport in the Philippines. Military advisers will aid in training Filipino soldiers for possible operations against the Abu Sayyaf militant group. Due to a Philippine law, the role of U.S. forces in an attack against the militant group is still being debated.

By Gretchen Schrock

The possible introduction of U.S. troops into combat in the Philippines would create a new front in the war on terror. Much controversy has ignited as conflicting statements are released from high-ranking officials in both countries.

Although the Philippine foreign secretary, Blas Ople, denied on Monday that U.S. armed forces would be included in combat operations inside the country's borders, Pentagon officials said last Thursday that nearly 3,000 U.S. Army, Marine and Navy forces, including 350 Special Operations soldiers, would participate in maneuvers against the militant Abu Sayyaf group, primarily on the southern island of Jolo, The Washington Post reported.

The U.S. military has been involved in training exercises in the Southern Philippines for the past year, but have not been officially allowed to enter into combat scenarios. The new military operations started on Sunday with 300 American troops training the Philippine army in commando tactics, night-vision flying and intelligence exercises, according to The New York Times.

Senior Pentagon officials have said that an explicit agreement exists between Philippine President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo and U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld concerning the specific roles that the U.S. military will be permitted to assume. Though Arroyo has yet to comment on this possible deployment, she said last year that she believed that combat duties for U.S. troops would be inside the parameters of Philippine law since it will not be a unilateral combat mission by foreign troops, but a joint effort led by the Philippine military.

"As we have stated, the U.S. and Philippine governments have agreed to conduct combined operations in the southern Philippines to disrupt and defeat the Abu Sayyaf group," Lt. Cmdr. Jeff Davis, a Pentagon spokesman, said to The New York Times. "These operations will be led by the armed forces of the Philippines with assistance by U.S. forces. We are respectful of our agreements with the Philippine government. We have been closely consulting with them about these operations, and will continue to do so."

Accounts of the U.S. deployment sparked considerable public dissent in the Philippines, causing immediate denials by the government.

"These reports emanate from junior officials who don't know what they are talking about," Ople said to The New York Times.

A senior Philippine military official, who requested anonymity, confirmed that the U.S. military would participate in combat operations on Jolo, beside Philippine counterparts, according to The Washington Post.

A U.S. military presence in any capacity is a sensitive issue among Philippine officials, who want to decrease their former colonizer's influence. Anti-American nationalism forced the closure of major U.S. bases in the Philippines a decade ago, according to The New York Times. The Philippine Constitution forbids the presence of foreign troops or bases unless explicitly outlined in a treaty. In addition, the Philippine Supreme Court recently decided that U.S. troops stationed in the Philippines could shoot only in self-defense.

"There's still this strong undercurrent of nationalism in the Philippines and it dates back to the United States' colonial history with the Filipinos," a Western diplomat said to The Washington Post. "Also, there's a sense of standing up to the big brother, to show some spine . . . as they are trying to think of themselves as sovereign equals with the United States."

Many Philippine citizens approve of the proposed U.S. operation, insisting that terrorism must be halted in order for the country to "improve its image, its economy and its self-esteem," The Washington Post reported. But, others predict the possibility of an anti-American backlash, especially in the Muslim-dominated South.

Datu Muedzul-Lail Kiram, a neighborhood councilor in the town of Sulu on Jolo Island, said to The Washington Post that he fears people in principally Muslim areas resent the American role in the defeat of Islamic insurgents in 1899 and the early 20th century.

"I am afraid the second Moro-American War would be triggered by this exercise," he said. "We don't want the Americans to invade our homeland."

The fact that the Philippine military has been unsuccessful in defeating the Abu Sayyaf rebel group of separatist Muslims provides the necessary justification for such U.S. involvement, according to The New York Times. Abu Sayyaf, which was founded in 1998 in order to create an Islamic state, may maintain contacts with al-Qaida through relations with Jemaah Islamiyah, an Indonesian terrorist group linked to al-Qaida. Its estimated 250 members have also been charged with kidnapping and murdering many Filipinos and Westerners since April 2000, according to CNN.com.

Philippine Defense Secretary Angelo Reyes met with Adm. Thomas B. Fargo, commander of the United States Pacific Command on Monday, and has scheduled meetings with Pentagon officials in Washington to discuss the details of the operation, The New York Times reported.

High gas prices may be due to price gouging

By David LaRoss
Staff Writer

Gasoline prices—in the United States as well as everywhere else—fluctuate continually in response to oil availability, the financial situations of domestic oil companies and even the whims of corner gas stations. Politicians, consumer groups and the attorney general of Florida claim that recent sharp price increases are evidence not of market factors but of industry price gouging—and now the U.S. Senate is taking up the call.

Last Friday, in a joint letter, Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., and Sen. Michael DeWine, R-Ohio, asked the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) to investigate the possibility that recent price spikes, which hit the Midwest particularly hard—Columbus, Ohio saw a 12 cent-per-gallon increase in one day—are due to price fixing by U.S. oil companies, taking advantage of the expected rise in costs due to the recent increase in the price of crude oil. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., made a similar request on Monday to Secretary of Energy Spencer Abraham.

"The causes of the price increases are not entirely clear, but it is critically important to ensure that they are not caused by price fixing or price gouging by oil companies, gas stations or others within the gasoline supply chain," Kohl and DeWine said in their letter, according to MSNBC.com.

Lieberman, a declared candidate for the 2004 Democratic nomination for president, requested that the Bush administration consider opening the Strategic Petroleum Reserves, temporarily halt deliveries into that reserve (freeing more oil for the consumer market) and request more oil from foreign suppliers, according to CNN.

"The department should monitor both domestic and international petroleum markets and take additional steps to mitigate supply disruptions," Lieberman said, according to The New York Times.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., has independently asked the FTC to begin an investigation.

According to MSNBC, an FTC spokeswoman said that the commission has no plans to conduct a detailed investigation, but that they take the matter "very seriously." Even if they do not conduct a full-scale investigation, the FTC has a standing program that monitors fuel prices nationwide.

Gas prices have risen an average of 7 cents in the last two weeks, bringing them to $1.70 per gallon, 54 cents above last year's level and only 7 cents below the all-time high recorded in 2001.

Prices higher than $2 per gallon are common in California. In Los Angeles, the most recent cost increase was met with organized protests.

According to MSNBC, the American Automobile Association has issued a statement that current market conditions do not justify the current prices.

Oil companies disagree, blaming the spikes on consumer fears over the drop in oil supplies that could result from a war in Iraq and a devastating political collapse in Venezuela, formerly a major oil producer.

"Prices have gone up because of world supply-and-demand conditions ... you either believe in supply and demand or conspiracy," said John Felmy of the American Petroleum Institute to CBS.

A week ago, two days after this statement was issued, 100,000 barrels of oil exploded in a barge docked in New York City, sending nationwide oil prices even higher.

Senate Democrats delaying Estrada vote

By David LaRoss
Staff Writer

Miguel Estrada was nominated for a seat on the District of Columbia circuit of the U.S. Court of Appeals in May 2001. Since his nomination, any discussion or voting on the confirmation has been consistently delayed. Almost two years later, he is facing real problems.

Estrada was nominated for the seat while the Senate was under Republican control, but when James Jeffords, I-Vt., left the GOP, turning control of the Senate over to the Democratic Party, the legislative body became less receptive to U.S. President George W. Bush's nominations. Estrada's nomination remained in limbo for almost 20 months, until Republicans won a Senate majority in the 2002 elections.

Estrada's nomination finally moved to the Senate floor in late January, when the now Republican-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee approved him by a 10-9 vote along party lines. If the vote in the Senate—which must approve any appointment to a federal court—were to split along the same lines, Estrada would be confirmed easily, since, according to MSNBC.com, three Democratic senators have declared their support for him.

The standard process in which the Senate questions nominees for the federal judiciary before voting on their appointment may end Estrada's chances. According to CNN.com, Democrats claim that during the questioning, Estrada avoided or refused to fully answer questions about his opinions on important past legal decisions.

When asked to identify three Supreme Court cases he disagreed with, Estrada said, according to CNN.com, "I'm not even sure that I could think of three that I would be ... that I would have a sort of adverse reaction to."

This behavior, combined with the White House's refusal to release memos Estrada wrote while he was an assistant to the Solicitor General under former President Bill Clinton, has prompted Senate Democrats to block any vote on Estrada's confirmation.

Republicans have a different view of the situation.

"The truth is he didn't answer questions in a way that could be used against him," said Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, to The Washington Post, claiming that Estrada answered every question he was asked.

"If this Senate decides that we cannot ask a nominee to the federal court a question as basic as his views on our Constitution, then we have been transformed into a rubber stamp," said Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., according to The New York Times.

Democrats claim that without firm answers to their questions, the Senate cannot effectively gauge Estrada's potential as a justice. They are demanding that the president make Estrada supply responses. This is particularly important because the seat Estrada has been nominated for is a traditional stepping-stone to the Supreme Court—three of the nine current judges came from that circuit.

According to The New York Times, some Democrats say that Estrada is actually a far-right conservative who was specifically selected because his lack of a "paper trail" made it easier to disguise his views.

"Without that information ... Miguel Estrada will never be a federal judge," said Senate Minority Whip Harry Reid, D-Nev., according to CNN.com.

Since the middle of February, the Democrats have been using a filibuster (a technique in which they hold the Senate floor indefinitely) refusing to relinquish the right to speak and preventing any action by the Senate until their opponents cede the point in question. Since forcing the issue would require 60 votes—in a Senate divided 51-48-1—Republicans are instead attempting to force the Democrats to end the filibuster on their own accord.

"Miguel Estrada is highly qualified, extremely intelligent," Bush said, according to CNN.com. "He has the votes necessary to be confirmed. Yet a handful of Democrats in the Senate are playing politics with his nomination, and it's shameful politics."

The administration is still refusing to release Estrada's memos from his time in the Solicitor General's Office, saying that doing so would set a precedent to prevent government lawyers from giving truly candid advice.

If Estrada were to be confirmed, he would be the first Hispanic justice on the Washington, D.C., district of the Court of Appeals.

According to CNN, Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, said, "If we deny Mr. Estrada the position on the D.C. Circuit, it would be to shut the door on the American dream of Hispanic Americans everywhere. Not that that should be the basis for our confirmation, but it's obviously very much a fringe benefit."

Estrada is not the first Hispanic to be nominated for the seat.

Miguel Estrada testifies before the Senate Judiciary Committee. Senate Democrats continue to delay discussion or voting concerning Estrada's nomination to the District of Columbia circuit of the U.S. Court of Appeals.

As things stand now, control of Estrada's fate rests with the Democrats.

"There's no reason to mince around this: We're not going to allow an up or down vote on Miguel Estrada," Reid said to MSNBC.com.

Men's and women's swimming win Patriots

Lady Bison set 15 new school records and tally 812.5 points en route to their first League championship

By Stephen Schwanhausser
Staff Writer

The women's swimming team competed against its rivals at the Patriot League Championships held at home in Kinney Natatorium last weekend. Boasting an undefeated record this year, the women were the favorites going into the meet, but no predictions could encompass the breadth of the University's accomplishments. Not only was the win a first for Bucknell in the history of the Patriot League, but another first was accomplished when the men's team won as well. This was the first time in league history that a men's and a women's team from the same school won in the same year.

For the women, record setting expands much further than the simple win for the meet. Their point total of 812.5 is a team high, and the Bison set 15 new school records and seven meet and league records along the way. Every single competitor scored points and individual best times were recorded in nearly every event.

The meet opened with the 200 Freestyle relay. Erica Wild '06 led the relay team, followed by Darby Golino '03, Mary Krakowski '06 and Meghan Freese '04. The Bison seized 1st place and destroyed the previous meet, league and team record by nearly 2 seconds when they touched first in 1:34.94. The Bison dominated the first individual event of the meet, the 500-yard free. Five women qualified with fast enough times in the morning to swim again at night, three of whom made it into the top eight. Daniela Faas '04 and Jen Cancro '04 finished 2nd and 3rd in times of 4:56.93 and 4:59.69, respectively. Both swims broke the old school record of 5:00.59 held by Cancro. The elusive 5-minute mark was finally broken. Jackie Feinthel '05 placed 5th right behind her teammates in 5:03.33. Filling out the event were Robin Gibson '05 and Krisztina Poda '04, who placed 9th and 11th, respectively.

The 200 IM was littered with Orange and Blue as well when the Bison stuck three swimmers in the final heat and one in consolations. Golino, Jamie Flick '05 and Vanessa Scaringi '06 placed 2nd, 4th and 8th, respectively, while Lauren Reed '06 finished 10th. Both Golino and Flick shattered the old school record of 2:09.05 set by Golino last year. Golino finished in 2:06.46, edging out Flick, who touched the wall in 2:07.84. The final individual event of the day was the 50 free, an event Freese dominated last year.

Bucknell has had a tradition of ownership in the sprint freestyle events since the league's conception as Hall of Famer Margaret Grunow owned league and school records. All this was to change as Freese exploded into the water breaking league, meet, pool and school records as she finished the event in 23.32. This time also qualified her for the United States National Meet and was an NCAA "B" qualifying time. She was followed by teammates Krakowski and Wild who placed 4th and 12th, respectively.

The women finished that night in style as Golino, Flick, Krakowski and Freese stepped up to the block for the 400 medley relay. Golino led off the event with a 100 backstroke time that broke the school record as she touched in 57.31. Flick quickly followed with an amazing breast stroke split of 1:03.80. She had the fastest split of the event by over 2 seconds. Krakowski hit the water and took off, sealing the win as she paced 56.60 in the 100 fly. The relay was complete as Freese destroyed the field, touching in 51.83 at the end of 100 yards of freestyle. A team expects success when its relay is the combination of the four top qualifiers in each stroke, but the final time of 3:49.54 destroyed the team record by over 4 seconds and set a new meet and league record by 3.5 seconds. At the end of the first night it was becoming apparent that this team would not be touched for the rest of the meet.

Men outdistance Patriot League foes and take home P.L. trophy for the first time in the team's history

The Bucknell men's swimming and diving team won the Patriot League Championships last weekend for the first time in the history of the program. It scored 701 points, a team record and was followed by Lehigh (632), American (580.5), Army (564), Colgate (365), Lafayette (342) and Holy Cross (183).

The Bison were able to complete their season at home in the Kinney Natatorium on Feb. 20-22.

"The atmosphere was electric because it was our pool and our home crowd. You could not help give your races everything you had because there were so many people behind you on the sidelines and the stands," Todd Bauer '06 said.

"This meet was the culmination of all the hard work put in this season by the team and the coaches," diver Adam Freeman '05 said.

The team hard all year for this meet and, for many, a lifetime of training had paid off.

"We started training in September for this meet, and all the hard work paid off. Most people on the team have been swimming and diving well over 10 years for a chance to win a championship," swimmer Kurt McCoy '03 said.

Winning this meet was truly a team effort; the Bison won only four individual events.

"The team set a goal in the beginning of the year that we would finish 1st in the league or last in the league, but we would do it as a team," Stelios Saffos '03 said. "I cannot imagine a

Women's track and field dominates Patriot League

Women's squad silences doubters with 60-point trouncing of Army; men land 3rd place behind Army and Lafayette

The women's track and field team repeated as Patriot League Indoor Champions, while the men finished 3rd this past weekend at Colgate.

"It definitely lived up to its billing as an intense meet," Assistant Coach Mario Wilson said.

To the women, the victory was about more than just winning.

"Winning the title meant establishing our own identity," Charity Brady '03 said. "After the seniors graduated from last year, there was a lot of apprehension as to whether we could win again. We have a great tradition of winning, so being able to bring home the cup again is a really good feeling."

Brady was part of the second-place 4x400-meter relay that also included Monique Boley '05, Nicki Piper '03 and Amy Calvo '05. The foursome accounted for 64 of Bucknell's 180 points. Brady placed 2nd in the 400 to Calvo in an exciting race that was decided in the final meters. A half-hour after the 400, Calvo put on one of the gutsiest performances of the meet by taking 2nd in the 500. Piper also put in strong performances as part of the 2nd-place 4x800 relay and individually, as she won the 800 by running from the front early and placed 4th in the 1,000.

Theresa Dennis '03 might be the only Lady Bison who ran a more grueling schedule than Piper and Calvo. Dennis won the 5k and then came back to place in the mile (3rd) and the 3k (2nd). In both the mile and 3k, Dennis passed many competitors in the last lap to make for two very exciting events.

"I was really excited to have the chance to run all three races and to prove myself to everyone. I feel that everyone gave it their all this past weekend. They all wanted the title so bad, that even after we knew we had it, we still didn't back down," Dennis said.

The women might have been led by a small group, but it was the entire team that won the title, scoring in 18 of 20 events.

"It was completely well-rounded," Associate Head Coach Joe Klim said. "They came together as a team and they did not want to lose. Looking at qualifying stats, it looked like it was going to be an intense battle with Army and Navy. But winning with one-third more points than 2nd-place means we hammered them."

Head Coach Kevin Donner was also pleased with the meet.

"It was about as perfect a meet as we could have had," Donner said. "In my 19 years of coaching, I have never seen a team rise as this team did. The intensity was relentless all weekend. This team has definitely developed its own identity after graduating that great class of 2002."

A few other impressive performances that helped form that identity included Jamie Lilien '03 taking 5th in the 55 hurdles in a time faster than her winning time in 2000. Also, Maria Garcia '05 took 2nd in the weight throw to lead a 16-point effort by the Bison in the event, and Dionne Bonds '04 and Robin Meling '04 surprised everyone by taking 1st and 5th in the triple jump.

This was the first time in nine years that the Bison men placed worse than 2nd in a league meet. Once again, Army won easily, but Lafayette (109 points) was able to capitalize on mixed results from the Bison and the addition of American to the Patriot League to beat the Bison (99 points).

Traditionally, Bucknell has picked up enough

Lady Bison continue search for consistency

Women's basketball squad takes down Lafayette, but falls to 11-13 overall and 6-6 in the league after bitter loss to Army

By Joe Schweitzer
Staff Writer

A huge 71-67 victory over Lafayette on Feb. 21 gave the Bucknell women's basketball team a huge lift beginning its final road trip of the season. Unfortunately, the Bison could not build on that momentum as their road trip ended with a bitter 91-79 loss to Army on Feb. 23. The Orange and Blue continue their struggles to find consistency as their record slips to 11-13 overall and 6-6 in league play.

The Bison showed no signs of weariness from the road trip to Easton as Chelsea Smith '06 and Lindsey Geosits '06 scored 4 points apiece to give Bucknell an early 10-0 lead. The Orange and Blue used a stingy defense to hold the Leopards to only two field goals in the first 9 minutes of the game as the squad continued to expand its advantage. Lafayette crept back into the game with its own run, but the Bison answered the challenge and used their own spurt to build a 35-23 halftime lead.

Head Coach Kathy Fedorjaka watches her Bison squad in action. The Bison have fallen to 11-13 overall and 6-6 in the league.

The Orange and Blue carried their momentum into the second half, expanding their lead to 21 points, 44-23. Lafayette responded by working the ball inside to standout Colleen Fitzpatrick, who ignited a 17-0 run that brought the Leopards racing back.

Then, Molly Creamer '03 took over the game. The All-American standout ended a five-minute Bucknell scoring drought with a bomb from downtown that fueled one of the most amazing performances of her illustrious career.

Creamer was an unstoppable goddess the final 13 minutes as she repeatedly assaulted the nets with a furious frenzy of points. Her competitive edge took the game over as even her teammates watched in awe as she rattled off the Bison's last 29 points of the contest and carried the squad to a 71-67 victory.

"Molly was amazing, as usual," All-league candidate Kate Franks '03 said. "She is such an amazing player that can get herself shots and score at will. She did what the team needed in order for us to pull out the win."

Creamer's 44 points again rewrote the record books, setting the record for most points ever scored in Lafayette's stadium. She has broken so many records over her career that Creamer started breaking her own records on Friday by topping her previous career high and the Patriot League record for points in a game.

The Lady Bison attempted to build on their two-game winning streak facing Army on Feb. 23, but Bucknell could not match Army's physical play inside and dropped a 91-79 decision.

Again the Orange and Blue sprinted out of the gates to an impressive 18-8 lead just 6 minutes into the contest. Army's offense settled down from there as they slowed the game's pace to a crawl and began establishing their inside players. Bucknell fought hard to maintain the lead, but two 11-2 Army outbursts sent the Bison reeling. Army's standout center Katie Macfarlane scored 9 points to fuel the second run and send Bucknell to the locker room down by 11, 46-35.

Army took advantage of the Bison's sluggish beginning to the second stanza and built their lead to as many as 19 points behind 8 more Macfarlane points en route to a 12-2 run. Franks connected on two straight treys to pull the Orange and Blue within 10, 70-60. The Black Knights pounded the ball inside and extended the lead to 15, but Bucknell battled to come within 10 points three more times before finally cutting their deficit to 8 points, 81-73, with 2:31 left in the contest. Army struggled from the charity stripe down the stretch to give the Orange and Blue hope, but the Bison were too worn down from battling Macfarlane inside to muster enough offense to make a complete the comeback falling 91-79.

"As a team we need to stay focused for 40 minutes and play the type of basketball that we are capable of playing with no let downs," Franks said. "We definitely need to step up our defense and continue to improve on our rebounding and everything else will follow."

Macfarlane battled to 32 points and 11 rebounds to top a list of five Black Knights in double digits who were poised to take advantage of an inexperienced Bucknell interior.

Creamer struggled from the field at times, but used a strong 11-13 free throw performance to net 27 points, adding to Franks' 19 points.

Desire Almind '04 continued her all-league-caliber play as she tallied 12 points and eight rebounds. Almind's performance helped her become just the 14th Bucknell women to surpass the 1,000-point plateau.

"We really did not get things rolling at all (against Army)," Franks said. "We just need to look at our weaknesses that they exposed and hopefully build off that."

The Orange and Blue return to the comfort of Sojka Pavilion this weekend to face Holy Cross at 5:30 p.m. tonight and battle Colgate on Sunday to finish out their home schedule.

Bison move into 3rd place in the Patriot League after dramatic 66-65 triumph over Army, bumping record to 13-12

The men's basketball team won its third-straight game on Feb. 23 in dramatic fashion by the count of 66-65 at Army. With the victory, Bucknell moved into a 3rd-place tie with American and Colgate with two league games remaining. The Bison will face 1st-place Holy Cross, aired on national television, at 9 p.m. tonight at Sojka Pavilion.

The Bison used a 12-0 run over a 6-minute span midway through the second half to turn a five-point deficit into a 55-48 lead. But the game was one of small runs and the Black Knights crept back into the game with a couple of three-pointers. An Army steal and layup put the Bison down 64-62 late in the contest. Kevin Bettencourt '06 tied the game with a clutch shot from the elbow with 1 minute, 34 seconds left. Bettencourt's bucket tied his career high with 20 points. Bettencourt talked about his production.

"I was really pleased with my game offensively," Bettencourt said. "It felt especially good because I struggled during the past couple of games. Most of all, however, I was glad that I could help the team get a win."

Davorin Skornik '04 said the team is confidence in Bettencourt's play.

"We all have faith in Kevin," Skornik said. "We needed a score and he made a great shot. I was so relieved when he hit it but there was still a minute and a half left, so it's not like it was over yet. We made a shot and then we needed a stop. That's what I was thinking about at that point."

A Mike Canty foul shot with under a minute remaining gave Army a 65-64 lead. Chris Niesz '05 had an opportunity to give Bucknell the lead with 30 seconds left, but his attempt from three-point range was off the mark and the Bison were forced to foul Canty again. He missed the front-end of the one-and-one, and captain Danny Blankenship '03 was fouled at the other end. Blankenship's front-end rimmed out and the Bison fouled Matt Collins. Collins missed his first shot of a one-and-one and Blankenship was fouled again at the other end on a drive with 8 seconds remaining. He hit both of his tosses to put Bucknell in the lead 66-65, which helped ensure the win.

"Danny's free throws were huge. Not many people are able to come through in that type of situation. I don't think people understand how much pressure he was under when he went to the line the second time," Bettencourt said. "The funny thing is that I think he was the only one who was nervous. If there was one guy we wanted back up on that line it was him, because he is a captain and if it wasn't for his leadership we may not have been in a situation to go to the line and win the game."

In Army's final chance to win the game, Collins took a baseline jumper while fading away from Boakai Lalugba '03 and the ball ticked the front of the rim and skipped off of the back.

The Bison outscored Army in the paint 32-20, thanks to Lalugba and Tarik Viaer-McClymont '06. Lalugba recorded his 15th double-double of the season with 19 points and 10 rebounds, while Viaer-McClymont added 9 points and 5 boards. They also shot 12-19 from the field.

The first half was just as exciting as the second frame, as there were four ties and seven lead changes. The Black Knights shot 59 percent and connected on five threes. Army's 36 points at the break were the most that Bucknell's 3rd-ranked defense in the nation had squandered since giving up 39 to Arizona State on Dec. 27. Skornik said the team was unable to stop Army consistently in the first half.

"We gave them some uncontested shots, which they made," Skornik said. "I still think that we played good defense for most of the game, though. They just knocked down some tough shots at times."

Bettencourt hit his first four shots from the floor and Bucknell looked to be off and running early, until Andy Smith scored 11 consecutive Black Knight points and put his team on top 34-29 with two minutes remaining in the half.

The Bison shot 51 percent from the floor, while the Black Knights shot an even 50 percent and hit 11 of 17 three-pointers. Bucknell swept the season series with the win and leads the all-time series 26-4 since the two teams joined the Patriot League in 1990-91. The Orange and Blue improved to 13-12 overall and 7-5 in the league, while Army dropped to 5-19 overall and 0-12 in the league.

This is heartbreak

A couple of weeks ago, ESPN.com's Page 2 ran an installment of its weekly feature "The List" showcasing the Web site's choices for the top 10 "most painful heartbreakers." As is usually the case with "The List," it was a little disjointed and arbitrary.

The authors chose to bypass the most conventional and tragic instances of "heartbreak" and opt instead for a benign rundown of last-second losses, bloopers, team migrations and more of the mundane. Admittedly, this can hardly be construed as a crime from a Web site that harvests its appeal by adopting a lighthearted stance on the sports world. Page 2 aims to amuse its audience with frivolity, not depress them with morbid profundity.

But the column complicated its usually levity by throwing onto the list a pair of real mood-crushers—Lou Gehrig's way-too-premature farewell and Ruffian's infamous demise, strange choices for a list that claimed to avoid untimely deaths.

"Heartbreak," according to the authors, "isn't word enough for those."

And they're right—"heartbreak" isn't emotionally expansive enough to cover the cruel twists of fate that ripped Clemente and Munson from the sky, overturned Prefontaine's MGB, swept Duk-Koo Kim and Jimmy Doyle into one-way comas and let the pink cocktail course through the final rounds of Go For Wand's bloodstream. That's not simply heartbreak; that's tragedy.

Heartbreak ought to be less morbid. But maybe something more serious than the losses and relocations on ESPN's list. They lack finality. It may be hard to place in perspective at times, but those moments—for us on the sidelines—are disappointments. Not heartbreak. Not by my definition.

So if death is worse than heartbreak and loss is something less than it, what exactly is heartbreak?

Heartbreak is the wicked snap of Dave Dravecky's humerus buckling midpitch in 1989, the sickening sound of a comeback killer—the end of his valiant effort to resurrect his career after having a malignant tumor removed from his pitching arm. It's the sight of the resolute lefty, who had come so far on such unlikely odds, clutching his disjoined arm and crashing down on the front of the mound, a pile of dirt he'd fought so hard to return to, a pile of dirt which, from that moment on, would never be a part of his life again.

Heartbreak is Gale Sayers' "good" knee giving out during the Bears' preseason in 1970, hammering the nails into the coffin as far as his career was concerned. It's seeing the most brilliant running back God ever created, who had already battled through reconstruction of his other knee, emerge from surgery only to realize that there would be no coming back this time around. It's realizing that something fantastic is over long before anyone even had a chance to find out just how fantastic it could be.

It's an errant Jack Hamilton fastball streaking through the air of a summer night in 1967 and drilling 21-year-old power-hitter-in-the-making Tony Conigliaro aside the head, breaking his cheekbone and destroying his visual acuity. It's Conigliaro, who fought stubbornly against inevitability and reality, finally understanding after one last surge in 1975, that it had all become an exercise in futility, that his game was over.

It's Ron Turcotte plummeting to the dirt at Belmont Park in 1978, and never standing up again. It's seeing a career that once landed him on the backs of Riva Ridge and Secretariat end by landing him in a wheelchair, an ending so devastating to him that for weeks he could barely force himself to eat, to get up every day and find something to strive for.

It's Tony Saunders sitting down behind a battery of microphones in late August of 2000, with a sling engulfing his left arm and a huge white splint partially obscuring the tattoo on his shoulder—a tattoo with the words "my world" scrawled over an image of a hand gripping a baseball. It's watching Saunders use his right hand, his functional hand, in a desperate and unavailing attempt to hold his tears at bay. It's the look in his eyes, glassy and bright red, as he faced the glaring lights and admitted to the media, to the baseball world, to those who had followed him through his first bout with a broken arm, and worst of all, to himself, that baseball and all the dreams that go with it were no longer feasible—"his world" would never be the same.

It's Todd MacCulloch learning last week that his body is beginning an unstoppable deterioration process that will eventually render his extremities barely functional. It's the poor hereditary luck that landed MacCulloch this disorder, the genetics that will make his everyday life a struggle and will place his basketball career far from reach.

It's the countless other athletes that no one ever knows about, writes about or remembers, who never get the chance to finish what they started. It's the termination of a dream, the cruel halt of an addictive chase, the realization that no effort can possibly generate another try, a next game. It's the reluctant abandonment of an irreplaceable passion.

That's heartbreak.

There's something else to heartbreak, though, that sometimes falls by the wayside, something that Page 2 doesn't attend to. It's hard to see, since it's buried in the shadow of tremendous sadness, but it's there.

It's Tony Saunders, a month after he said goodbye to baseball, clad in street clothes and still donning a sling, crouching on the back of the mound at Tropicana Field—a place that had once played a crucial role in his now-forsaken dream. It's the beautiful 3-year-old girl—Saunders' daughter—standing in front of him, proudly dressed in an oversized Devil Rays jersey with her daddy's name and number on the back, hurling the ceremonial first pitch towards the plate with all her strength.

It's the look in Saunders' eyes, maybe a little glassy, but no longer red, as he walks away from his old world—a world he'll never forget—one last time, with his new world—the world he'll live for for the rest of his life—at his side holding onto the hand of his good arm.

That's what makes it tolerable. Where death is the end of a story, heartbreak is only the end of a chapter.

Sometimes you just need to keep reading.

Testing the waters

Heading to Dallas, we report on the Emmitt Smith-Jerry Jones Saga. Jones, owner of the Cowboys, expects that a decision on whether to retain Smith on the team or release the NFL's all-time rusher by this weekend.

"We know he's NFL royalty, he's Dallas Cowboys royalty,"' Jones said. "But this is about the future of the team. We're looking at the future of the team and there are a lot of things involved. It's not about Emmitt's ability to play. We know he can play."

And play he can. Smith, who is the lifeline to the early '90s glory years of three Super Bowls, is not just the best running back on the Cowboys, but the arguably the leader. I remember last summer when I visited Texas Stadium for the first time. During halftime of a Pop Warner football game (Do those kids know how incredibly lucky they are?), I ran onto the field, touched the "Star" and then proceeded to dive into the end zone à la Smith style over a once-powerful offensive line. Smith, a leader on and off the field, earns the respect of teammates and fans alike. He is not a replaceable figure in Dallas—at least not in the near future.

Backup Troy Hambrick has shown flashes of brilliance, yet does not have a tremendous upside to circumvent Smith to the bench. Bill Parcells, the Cowboy's new Jimmy Johnson-type coach, has steered clear of this issue and allowed Smith and Jerry to figure it out. Dallas owns the fifth pick in the upcoming draft and would be better off working on a playmaking wide receiver or solid offensive tackle to take some of the pressure off of Smith than drafting on a hunch that a running back would pan out. That being said, on the second day of draft, picking up a Larry Johnson, running back from Penn State might be an early Christmas present. Coming off a serious injury, Johnson's stock has plumuted, but he has made it known that he plans on getting back into playing shape.

Asked if he would consider being a backup in Dallas or anywhere else, Smith said he would "weigh all options, that much I will do."'

From a diehard Cowboys fan, Jerry, don't let him go.

Heading due north, Kurt Warner has hit the jackpot for next season, earning an extra $6 million dollar bonus to retain a St. Louis Rams jersey. The Rams also would not change the $5.3 million in base salary the two-time NFL MVP is due in 2003, but would restructure the backend of the contract that runs through the 2006 season, Jay Zygmunt told the St.Louis Dispatch.

I'm happy for Warner and his financial group, but he should be backing up Marc Bulger. Bulger led the Rams to a 6-1 record as starting quarterback last season while Warner led his team to a dismal 0-6 record. Now 31, Warner isn't getting any faster and injuries start to crumble players in their early 30s. You can't ignore stats like above, and although it is refreshing to see loyalty in football, when it is clear your backup has the respect of your players, being honest with yourself is key.

Spring Break on MTV might involve a few more basketball courts this year with news that MTV might be used to televise March Madness games. If the United States goes to war with Iraq and major developments occur during the NCAA Tournament, CBS might pre-empt its basketball telecasts. If that happens, CBS Sports president Sean McManus said CBS probably would shift the games to MTV, VH1 or TNN, each owned by Viacom, who owns CBS as well. Imagine Carson Daly doing play-by-play for a Sweet 16 game? "Totally out of fashion No. 12 moves the ball down the court and passes it to a guy who should be Limp Bizkit's lead guitarist. Let's see that highlight again … again."

"That's a decision you have to make at the time of the crisis," McManus said. "If there is a war going on and there are important news elements to cover, that will take precedent over a sporting event."

If you're heading to Alaska for spring break, you might fish out a new pair of shoes. Some 33,000 basketball shoes have spilled from a container ship off Northern California drifting toward Alaska. While I am sure many "Perfect Storm" diehard Nike shoe fans have begun to set sail, but one word of advice for you. An oceanographer who tracks the shipments said Nike forgot to tie the laces together, so your chances of finding the correct size and foot might be a monumental task. The shoes have apparently been bobbing around since December when they toppled off cargo ship on its way from Los Angeles to Tacoma, Wash. A Nike spokesman said people who find soggy sneakers can mail them to the company for recycling. Sure, just after I cash in my soda bottles….

We are at the crossroads of professional sports. Baseball is a month away, basketball and hockey teams are working hard for playoff positions and March Madness is within smelling distance! Buckie up, this is going to exciting. .

All Mets are off

Without question, the more things change, the more they stay the same. In their first spring training game of the year, the New York Mets fell to the St. Louis Cardinals 7-2. Matt Morris worked his way out of a second inning jam while the Mets committed two errors in the third, tabbing four unearned runs to Al Leiter. Seems like just yesterday when the Mets were blowing the lead in games that counted; glad to see all these roster moves pay off.

That's right, there's a whole slew of new faces for New Yorkers to curse like it was J. Lo in Manhattan. From Tom Glavine, formerly of the archnemesis Atlanta Braves, and Mike Stanton, from the archnemesis New York Yankees, the acquisition of these two players marks a new GM strategy. Amending the old "if you can't beat them, join them" adage, teams are subscribing to the new "if you repeatedly obliterate them, give them your best players to even things out" policy. We'll call this the "kickball method" of franchise management.

The Mets are now a hodgepodge team of veterans and unstellar youths hackneyed together like some abominable Frankenclub. The starting rotation is like molding cheese left out on the counter. The age of the starting four—coincidentally in descending age order—as well, posts Al Leiter at 38, Glavine at 37, Pedro Astacio at 34 and Steve Trachsel at 33.

On the field, there are two well-aged outfielders and three elderly infielders, all of whom voted for LBJ, and then the left side of the infield is composed of one twentysomething and one teen-ager, both of whom haven't gotten to those letters in the alphabet yet.

Reports say Mo Vaughn has lost about 40 pounds and is down to 13 percent body fat—I myself carry a hefty 30 percent body fat; Art Howe is the Joe Torre doppelganger of Queens, but with a lot less talent to work with; Owner Fred Wilpon is undergoing a process of "boss-ification," adopting a more Steinbrenner-esque approach to team management; Mike Piazza still thinks he can last another two years behind the plate though both his knees have filed for a restraining order; and the starting shortstop by midseason will likely be a boy who isn't allowed sweets and can't stay up past 11 on weeknights—now I ask, how is he supposed to get addicted to steroids, dietary supplements and pain relievers if he can't even have an Almond Joy after a big game?

The Mets have the second highest payroll in baseball and, next to the Yankees, they're the only ones getting tabbed with the new luxury tax (though the Yankees' tax ranks in the millions while the Mets fee is something like $350 grand—just a point of reference, when Benny Agbayani was the starting left fielder for the Mets, he made about $250,000).

Let the games begin.

At this point, Steve Phillips' job is more tender than Etienne's face, post-Tyson. Steve better look for some sort of backup plan because there's nothing New York likes more than a scapegoat. Bobby Valentine felt that Damocletian sword last offseason and if the Mets don't start turning things around, Steve is going to find himself on the receiving end of a pink slip sandwich … hold the mayo. Wokka wokka wokka.

But seriously, the Mets need to start their season off right. They need to find their fifth starter, a starting shortstop and third baseman, and they need to get some wins early. The Mets, like all New York teams, are notorious for coming out of the gate with all the pizzazz of a gimp emu being crushed under the oppressive weight of the gravity of Jupiter. The Mets need to show that their mistakes last season won't be duplicated.

But what it really comes down to is whether or not the old folks got game. The Mets have a lot of really young players that have to make an impact without the support staff that they truly need. When the Yankees brought up Alfonso Soriano and Nick Johnson they had Chuck Knoblauch, Randy Velarde and Jason Giambi as safety nets and mentors to make sure the young'ens didn't crash and burn. The Mets have Rey Sanchez. Pray it doesn't come down to that.

But with all of this, there is still hope, hope that only the best bobble-head mascot could possibly give, hope that resides in the giant spherical head of Mr. Met. My prediction? New York Mets win the World Series in three games as the other team forfeits due to supreme intimidation by the lobbying of the AARP.

Today's rivalries fuel intense competitions in many sports

By Mark Walker
Staff Writer

Last week, in men's college basketball, Duke and Maryland renewed what has become one of the greatest and most exciting rivalries in all of sports. Like many of their recent matchups, this game came down to the wire, with Duke prevailing 75-70.

Duke-UNC was once unquestionably the NCAA's greatest rivalry. Some of the bad blood between the two schools has worn off due to a recent decline in UNC's program. This has allowed Duke-Maryland to take center stage as the greatest rivalry in men's college basketball.

This rivalry took off in 2001, as the teams met four times, including a matchup in the ACC semifinals and the Final Four. Duke won 3 of 4 that year, including the Final Four meeting, the ACC tournament meeting and an overtime thriller that included a 10-point comeback in the final 54 seconds of regulation. These cliffhangers created a lot of bad blood and top-notch competition between the two league rivals.

This got me thinking, in other leagues, what are currently the best rivalries based on hatred and good competition?

NCAA football:

Army-Navy was once undoubtedly the greatest rivalry in college football. While the tradition of that annual game survives, the success of the programs does not, which has caused the rivalry to diminish. Recently, some hatred has grown among Miami, Florida State and Florida, but currently the greatest rivalry in college football is most likely Michigan-Ohio State. This has been a fairly strong rivalry for almost a century now, and it received a great boost last season. With the National Championship in Ohio State's sight, Michigan traveled to Ohio State to play a spoiler's role. Ohio State squeaked by 14-9 and went on to win the National Championship.

Women's college basketball:

Connecticut-Tennessee, no question about it. Nobody can compare to these two colleges' women's basketball programs.

Major-league baseball:

For years, the Giants and Dodgers held the title as the greatest rivalry in the league, especially when both teams played in New York. With time, the animosity between those two teams has decreased, handing the throne to three new, equally exciting rivalries: The Mets-Braves, Yankees-Red Sox and Cardinals-Cubs. The Mets-Braves took off in 1999, as John Rocker and Chipper (Larry) Jones had a few choice words for Mets fans and New York. The rivalry was enhanced by one of the most exciting league championships ever, with the Braves prevailing 4-2 in a series that featured two multiple extra-inning thrillers and Robin Ventura's "Grand Slam Single."

The Yankees and Red Sox have been rivals since the "Curse of the Bambino." This rivalry has recently grown as the two teams have frequently sat atop the American League East. Adding fuel to the fire was a series of great pitching duals between ex-Red Sox, now Yankees, hurler Roger Clemens and current Red Sox pitcher Pedro Martinez.

Finally, the Cardinals and Cubs have always been division rivals because of their close Midwest proximity. Their rivalry was enhanced by the home run competition between Mark McGwire and Sammy Sosa that took place in the late 1990s.

National Hockey League:

Back in the days of the "original six," the Maple Leafs and Canadiens were by far and away the league's greatest rivalry. That rivalry has not held up with time and with the NHL's expansion. Then, in the '90s, the Devils-Rangers developed a heated rivalry filled with lots of excitement. That rivalry significantly faded when the Rangers failed to beat the Devils in 23 straight games from 1997 to 2001.

Now, the Avalanche and Red Wings hold the throne. These teams seem to meet deep in the Western Conference Playoffs every year, which has created strong competition and hatred between the two. Adding to the rivalry were two massive brawls in the late '90s that included the Avalanche goalie Patrick Roy and Wings goalies Mike Vernon and Chris Osgood.

National Basketball Association:

In the '80s, the NBA was dominated by the Celtics-Lakers rivalry. Then, the Knicks-Heat became the best rivalry during the '90s. The NBA has lacked a great rivalry for the past couple of years, but tension that has recently arisen between the Kings and Lakers is forming the league's new greatest rivalry.

This intense competition between the two teams took off last year after a seven-game thriller in the Western Conference Finals, with the Lakers prevailing. A lot of trash talking has also gone on between the two teams over the past year. Most notably, Shaquille O'Neal angered the Kings as he referred to them as the best team in the WNBA.

National Football League:

Rivalries come and go frequently in the NFL. The Redskins-Cowboys, Raiders-Chiefs and Packers-Bears have all been big rivalries in the past. The largest current rivalry is likely that between Green Bay and Tampa Bay, a matchup once referred to as "The Bay of Pigs." The highest point of this rivalry came this season as Packer's Coach Mike Sherman got in Warren Sapp's face after he thought Sapp gave a cheap shot on Packer Chad Clifton. Now, the only question is whether or not this rivalry will survive now that the Packers and Bucs are in different divisions.

Lady Bison dominate P.L. Championships, set 15 school records

Friday night opened with the 200 medley relay and once again the team of Golino, Flick, Krakowski and Freese dominated, destroying meet, league, pool and school records with a time of 1:44.35. This broke the Patriot League record by over 2.5 seconds and left the competition in their wake.

As the individual events began, the Bison lengthened their stride. Faas, Scaringi and Feinthel delivered in the top heat, in the form of 2nd, 5th and 7th places, respectively. Faas touched in 4:28.51, crushing the school record by 2 seconds. The 100 fly was up next and, as predicted, Krakowski was at the head of the pack. She placed 2nd in a time of 57.06 and was followed by Lauren Mosler '03 (6th) and Lauren Reed '06, who won the consolation heat in 59.31 and placed 9th.

The freestylers were back in the 200 and once again made Grunow proud. Lectie Altman '06 and Cancro were finished 1-2, while breaking meet, league, school and pool records as they touched in 1:53.11 and 1:53.22 respectively. The consolation final was rounded out by co-captain Becky Dolan '03 and Gibson. Dolan had a breakout swim of 1:54.17, which would have placed her 4th in the event; she is now 4th all time in the Bucknell record book. She won the consolation heat and placed 9th while Gibson was 15th in 1:58.24.

The 100 breast was up next and the Bison performed in style as Flick and Mosler qualified for the final heat and Melissa Capperell '06 made it into consolations. Flick dominated the event, winning in 1:04.69, breaking her own school record by a full second. She is now over 3 seconds ahead of anyone else who has ever swam the event for Bucknell. Mosler was 7th in 1:08.56 and Capperell finished 16th in 1:09.80. The Bison were set to destroy the 100 backstroke as well with Golino, Altman and Freese in the final heat with Trish Rado '05, qualifying for the consolation final. Golino finished 1st in 57.36, breaking her own school record by half a second. Altman finished 3rd in 57.84 followed closely by Freese, who touched in 58.34. Rado rounded out the event winning the consolation heat in 1:00.04, placing 9th.

The first women's diving event of the meet was the 1-meter event in which Sarah Petcavage '04 placed 8th with 197.40 points.

The last event of the night was the 800 freestyle relay. With the top two finishers in the 200 free (Altman and Cancro), it was sure to be a strong event. The team was rounded out by Dolan, who had the fourth fastest time in the two free, and Faas, who was second in the 500 free. Navy put up a race, and at the end of 200 yards, the Bison were down by 3 seconds due to a lead off by Navy's Jen Windstein, who would later earn Swimmer of the Meet. Dolan dove in the water and held even pace with Navy's second leg. Altman dove in the water three body lengths behind, but made up the gap outsplitting Navy's swimmer by 2.5 seconds. Going into the final leg was Cancro, who is known for her incredible back-half finishes. Leaving it all in the pool, she had the best split of the event in 1:52.73 and in the end it was all Bucknell as the relay team finished with a time of 7:35.25. The time not only beat Navy but set league, meet, pool and team records. The league and meet record was crushed by a full 2 seconds and the Bucknell record is now 6 full seconds better; the previous record was set only last year.

By the end of the second day the women led the team front by an incredible 170.5 points. Saturday night opened with the 1,650 freestyle. Head Coach Jerry Foley's distance swimmers were ready and the top 16 qualifiers included Faas, Cancro, Gibson, Dolan and Poda. Faas finished 2nd in 17:05.85, crushing her own school record by eight seconds. She was supported by Cancro, who was 4th (17:31.63); Gibson, who placed 5th (17.39.61); Dolan, who was 6th (17:40.70); and Poda, who finished 9th in 17:49.17. Records and points continued to flow in Bucknell's direction.

The longer 200 stroke events began positively as the 200 backstrokers stepped into the water. Golino and Altman qualified 1st and 2nd with Rado rounding out the final heat seeded 8th. The depth of the team was displayed in this event during the morning session as Bison swimmer Leslie Rice '05, who was exhibition, touched the wall in 2:09.86, which would have qualified her 7th. As the nighttime competition began the seeds proved correct as Altman and Golino paced the entire race together to finish 1st and 2nd, respectively. Although they both broke league, meet, pool and school records, Golino touched first in 2:02.27 with Altman right behind her in 2:02.66. Rado filled out the heat finishing 8th in 2:12.58.

The 100 free was next and Meg Freese was back to turn heads. She broke meet, league, pool and school records as she won the event in 51.09. She destroyed the heat winning by 1.5 seconds, and brought in yet another Bison victory.

The 200 breast stroke was next to compete and no one could touch Flick. She won by 3.5 seconds, finishing in a pool and school record time of 2:20.30. Mosler and Capperell supported her with 11th and 13th place finishes in 2:28.54 and 2:31.73, respectively.

By the time the 200 butterfly came around it was clear that the Bison were unstoppable. They still had four swims at night, three in finals and one in consolations. Dolan, Feinthel, and Scaringi made the top eight while Krakowski made the top 16. Dolan was 4th with another breakout swim, bettering her individual best by 2.5 seconds. She was followed closely by Feinthel in 5th (2:11.44) and Scaringi in 7th (2:13.11). Krakowski filled out the event placing 14th in 2:14.78.

The final event of the meet was the 400 freestyle relay and their 4th-place finish was the least strong event for the Bison. It was of no consequence once the team of Freese, Cancro, Altman and Golino touched in 3:32.37 the second best time in school history. The women's team earned 812.5 points, a full 237 points ahead of the nearest competition, Navy.

"This was just unbelievable. This was an incredible year for both [men's and women's] teams. These two teams will go down in history as two of the best ever at Bucknell. Words just can't describe my pride and love for this special group," Foley said, wet from being thrown in the pool.

Foley earned the Coach of the Year award for both the men's and women's teams. He made it clear that this success was not only due to his commitment, but to that of the entire staff of assistant coaches Kathleen O'Dell, Judson Aungst and Sandy Elion, Head Diving Coach Errol Carter and academic liaison Carl Milofsky. The success of the two teams was completely unprecedented and both coaches and swimmers were in awe.

"To win for the first time, at home in a brand new pool, and for the guys to win next to us for the first time in league history ... it's just unbelievable," Dolan said. "To know that my class will graduate the first champions is just the best way to go out. We have begun a new Bucknell tradition of winning that I think will stick. I know that in the next few years this team will step to new heights and simply dominate. This is the best day of my life."

The Bison come off this win sending a small team to the ECAC championships at Pitt next weekend. With new time standards met, the team will also send participants to the Senior National Championship in a month.

The 200-yard freestyle relay team of Jake Thieman '05, Michael Guskey '03, Michael Willats '04 and Peter Garvin '04 started the meet by winning in a 1:22.17. In the next event, the 500 freestyle, Bauer captured 5th place in 4:38.66, while McCoy placed 9th in 4:39.81. Stephen Schwanhausser '03 (4th), Matt Hallowell '04 (8th) and Geoffrey Konopka '03 (9th) added more points in the 200 individual medley.

Garvin gave the team its first individual win of the meet in the 50 freestyle with a time of 20.52. Bucknell also earned 9th-, 10th- and 11th-place points in this event with good swims from Guskey (21.33), Willats (21.42) and Saffos (21.44), respectively. Freeman then placed 3rd in the three-meter diving with a 417. The first day of the meet ended with a 2nd-place finish in the 400 medley relay (3:22.93), which was composed of Christopher Feinthel '03, Guskey, Mark Kretzer '06 and Garvin.

The second day started the same way the first had ended, with another 2nd place. This time it was in the 200 medley relay. The team of Kretzer, Guskey, Garvin and Willats finished in 1:32.00. The Bison continued to rack up the points as the day went on. Hallowell (7th) and Gonzalo Diaz '03 (13th) swam well in the 400 individual medley. Garvin and Kretzer swam their second event of the day, placing 5th and 6th in the 100 butterfly. Bauer swam to another 5th-place finish with a 1:43.79 in the 500 freestyle, and McCoy placed 10th.

The final for the 100 breaststroke was filled with Bucknell swimmers. They had six top sixteen times, five of which were top eight times. Guskey was second with a 55.76. Schwanhausser was 4th with a 56.66. Saffos (57.49), William Schilling '06 (58.05) and Konopka (58.59) secured 6th, 7th and 8th places, respectively. Andrew Steiner '05 was 12th with a 59.51.

The day ended with good performances by Feinthel (4th), Kretzer (6th), Michael Harrigan '04 (13th) and Willats (15th) in the 100 backstroke, and the 5th-place 800 freestyle relay team of Bauer, Kretzer, Hallowell and McCoy in a 6:59.24.

The final day of the meet held three firsts for the Bison. It began with impressive swims from Bauer (2nd), McCoy (5th), Diaz (7th) and Steiner (10th) in the mile. Adam Freeman then earned enough points (299.73) in the one-meter diving. Feinthel added more points with a 5th in the 200 backstroke in a 1:53.19.

Garvin gained his second individual gold of the meet in the 100 freestyle in a pool record time of 45.58; Thieman was 9th in the event. The 200 breast stroke was another event filled with Bucknellians. Schwanhausser and Schilling finished 3rd and 4th, respectively. Konopka and Steiner were 7th and 11th, respectively.

Kretzer won the second individual event of the day for the Bison with 1:52.66 in the 200 butterfly. Harrigan (10th), Hallowell (14th) and Diaz (2:02.33) also all swam well. Bucknell solidified its win with a 3rd in the 400 freestyle relay, which was made up of Thieman, Saffos, Willats and Garvin.

Head Coach Jerry Foley was the recipient of the Coach's Award.

"For the seniors this capped off our swimming careers, and for the underclassmen it set forth a tradition that will continue for many years," McCoy said.

The team was able to capitalize on its depth and great performances from everyone.

"Our whole team swan unbelievable and it was the perfect ending to my college career," Feinthel said.

The team not only won the Patriot League Championship, but it made history as well.

"This team was the first Bucknell men's swimming and diving team to win a Patriot League Championship, and the combined women's victory marked the first time in the Patriot League swimming and diving history for one University to win both the men's and women's championships," Assistant Coach Kathleen O'Dell said.

Lacrosse drops season opener

By Pat Evans
Sports Editor

The men's lacrosse team dropped its season opener against a highly touted 9th-ranked North Carolina squad 13-3. The Bison scored the first two goals of the contest but were dominated the rest of the way.

The Tar Heels won 18 of the game's 20 faceoffs and outshot the Bison 55-22, dominating the critical category of time of possession.

"Our defense was doing a good job holding them, but there's only so much you can do when a team as good as North Carolina has the ball for about 80 percent of the time," goalie Justin Sussman '03 said.

Stormy weather conditions certainly were a factor for the Bison, who had been unable to practice outside coming into the match. When the defense did get the ball they were often unable get the transition game going, which could have been attributed to the slippery conditions' effect on their sticks. Whatever the reason, that was the deciding factor of the game.

"When the defense gets possession but fails to get the ball to the offense, it's a problem," Head Coach Sid Jamieson said. "And the few times that the offense did get the ball, we didn't take advantage of it."

The Bison started the game strong with Chris Cara '05 and Patrick Christenson '05 tallying the first goals of the contest, but after that it was all Tar Heels as Andrew Sanders '03 scored the Bison's last goal at the 6-3 mark.

"We started the game off well," Cara said. "We kept the ball moving by passing it around on offense, but then they just controlled the game after that."

Like the Bison, the Tar Heels have most of their team returning from last year and have a highly powerful offense. Unfortunately for the Bison, the Tar Heels were able to use their offense more often.

"They are so precise," Sussman said. "They rarely threw the ball away, which made it difficult for us to get possession."

Jamieson sees the major areas of improvement as faceoffs and defensive clearing of the ball, two things the Bison will work on for their next game this weekend at Harvard.

"These are fixable problems that we have," Jamieson said. "It's not like we are physically unable to get better, which is very good news."

Since the North Carolina game was not a Patriot League contest, which the Bison value more because of its implications regarding the NCAA bid, they try to view it as a learning experience more than anything else.

"We've got to learn the lessons that this game taught us," Jamieson said. "It's time to put the old results to bed and go out and play the next one. We look to improve every time we play; that's the key."

The Bison have kept their heads up and realize that they have a long season in front of them that will not be determined by one game.

They've been studying tape of Harvard, who edged them out last year 10-9, and are confident that they will be on the winning side this time.

"We feel like we match up much better against Harvard than we did against North Carolina," Cara said. "It seems like our plays should work well."

The Bison's outlook on the season as a whole has not changed with the opening loss.

"Obviously we would have loved to have done better," Sussman said. "But we know we're a good team. We've got to come out and turn this thing around and we are very confident that we can do that."

points in the mid-distance and distance races to ensure runner-up status, but since American's track team is primarily made up of mid- and long distance runners, it has been tapping into the Bison's points. Lafayette used the American/Bucknell dogfight to its advantage by developing its team primarily around sprinters.

"It is obvious that their [American] distance program is national-class. I think they will force everyone else in the league including us to step it up," Donner said.

The men did have a few bright spots. Noel Powell '04 set a new Patriot League meet record in winning the long jump. Unfortunately, a knee injury hurt him in his bid to win the 200. Coming off a somewhat disappointing 5th in the 5,000, Bryan Johnston '03 came back to finish 2nd in the 3,000, losing by a mere half-second.

Other Bison competed as hard as they have all season, but came up short. Lou Palma '03 pulled the quadruple by leading the Bison to 3rd place in the 4x800, 4th in the mile, 3rd in the 800 and 2nd in the distance medley relay. Emory Strother '04 leapt to 2nd in the high jump and 4th in the long jump, and Mike Mellas '04 set two personal bests in taking 5th in the triple jump and 4th in the pentathlon. Adam Kaufman threw a seasonal best to grab 4th in the weight throw, and Justin Alden-Dunn '06 set a personal best in the pole vault to earn 5th place.

Although pleased with a few individuals' performances, the coaching staff was not entirely happy with the team as whole.

"I don't think the guys came together as a group," Klim said.

Donner said there were team problems as well.

"We had a few mental errors and a little bad luck in a few key events which were not offset with some other events," Donner said.

Klim was disappointed in the team's luck.

"Richard Alexander ['03] had the fastest qualifying time in the 55 hurdles semifinals and then got hit in the arm by the guy next to him going over the first hurdle in the finals. It's unfortunate, but what can you do?" Klim said.

Don't expect the men to dwell on loses or the women to rest on their laurels for too much longer though.

"We have to regroup. In the short term, we want to do well at ECAC/IC4A and in the long term, the women want to reclaim their outdoor title, while the men want to at least get back into 2nd for outdoor leagues again," Wilson said.

The Junge Watch

Following Bucknell's major-league alumnus

Last September, Bucknell graduate Eric Junge '99 enjoyed a successful stint with major-league baseball's Philadelphia Phillies, earning two wins and compiling a 1.42 ERA in 12.2 innings of work. Junge, the first Bison to play in the majors since 1958, is currently working out with the Phillies at their spring training, which commenced in mid-February.

The Bucknellian will continue to track Junge as he vies for a position on the Phillies' pitching staff and adds to his major-league experience during the 2003 season.

The latest news: In his first spring training appearance of 2003, Junge earned a save against the Pittsburgh Pirates. He pitched 2.1 scoreless innings, giving up a hit and a walk and striking out one during the solid outing. He also scored a run after being walked in his only plate appearance.

Working on the campaign trail: Louisiana

"I'm just going to go and see what happens. It's the only race left in the country. Everyone who is anyone will be there. It's going to be a close race but I think she can win. The party needs a win to get going in the right direction again; man, does the party need a win right now," I said. But really, the most important reason I was about to take a month-long detour on my cross-country trip home was that I could and I didn't know when in the rest of my life I would be able to do something like that.

As the disappointment from the result of our race in Kansas subsided, I spent a couple of evenings talking to the family of our campaign treasurer. Tom Docking had been a lieutenant governor and gubernatorial nominee before advising our campaign, which had ended a week before our conversation. His wife, Jill, ran an impressive campaign for U.S. Senate in 1996 before coming up just short at the end. They now had a son in law school, a daughter in the middle of her senior year in high school and two successful careers, him as a lawyer and her in financial services. I couldn't have found people better suited to listen to for advice and wisdom about balancing politics, careers and family.

For the first time in almost three years, I didn't have a girlfriend to race home to. When my brother, the most important person in my life, told me to go for the campaign instead of coming home and that we would have enough time to catch up after the campaign, I made up my mind to drive to Louisiana for the Senate runoff between Democratic Sen. Mary Landrieu and her Republican challenger, Suzanne Haik Terrell.

The only glitch in this plan was that the Landrieu campaign hadn't hired me yet. In fact, although I had spoken with the field director, there was no promise of a job when I left Wichita, Kan., for the two-day drive to Baton Rouge, La. I arrived at the Democratic Party Headquarters, waited for a few hours to meet with the field director, and finally convinced him that I knew how to be a field organizer.

It was a good thing that he hired me that evening, because I didn't have enough credit left on my credit cards for a hotel room. I had a small amount of cash left, but that would be necessary for gas and food if I needed to drive from Louisiana to home in Virginia. That evening, I was excited to be given the key at a hotel so dirty that half of our group refused to sleep there and left to pay for their own hotel room somewhere else. In fact, had I not been hired that day, I had been fully prepared to spend the night in my car before starting my journey home.

I was joining hundreds of campaign staff who had just arrived in the state for this runoff election. We were all here because Louisiana's election laws are a little bit different than the rest of the states'. Instead of having a primary system where each party picks one nominee for each position during the spring or summer, Louisiana allows as many people from each party as want to run. The only stipulation is that if none of the candidates received more than 50 percent of the votes, there is a runoff a month later between the top two vote-getters. In this case, Landrieu had led the race on Nov. 5 with 46 percent. Leading a field of three Republicans was Elections Commissioner Terrell, who received 27 percent. Now, the runoff election was set for Dec. 7.

Each party sent campaign workers from all over the country to work on this race. I was eventually assigned to work with a crew of field organizers from South Dakota. They had just finished winning the Senate race there by 527 votes, or 0.16 percent. The parking lots of most of the hotels in Baton Rouge contained groups of cars from faraway states. Our hotel had three cars from Virginia, one from New Jersey, two from New York and about nine from South Dakota. Next door there was a La Quinta that had five or six cars from Florida and Texas. Most of these cars had bumper stickers on them—"Tim Johnson for Senate" on the South Dakota cars, "Bush for Governor" on Florida's cars or "Cornyn for Senate" on the cars from Texas. The sight of these cars rolling out of the parking lot at 8 every morning and then reappearing at 8 or 9 every night, for three or four straight weeks must have confused many of the locals.

This was the way each party intended to win the race, with massive amounts of field personnel. The rest of the factors in the race contributed to an even match. The Republicans brought in U.S. Vice President Dick Cheney and U.S. President George W. Bush to gain media attention and increase name recognition for Terrell. Landrieu relied on her record of service to the state and the fact that most of the people in Louisiana already knew who she was.

Members of the Baton Rouge district field team relax at a local restaurant late on the night of the runoff election. The campaign workers enjoyed the culture and vitality of the local area, including Louisiana State University.

Both parties spent enormous amounts of money on the race. In fact, the other senator from Louisiana, Democratic Sen. John Breaux, said that the runoff election brought so much money into the state that he considered it "the second Louisiana Purchase."

Our team was responsible for the counties around Baton Rouge and on the border with Mississippi in the eastern part of the state. We spent the daytime hours canvassing registered Democrats to remind them to vote and to give them information about Landrieu. In the evenings, we called more voters, sometimes to pitch our candidate, sometimes to prospect for volunteers. After the calls, we usually got some food and went back to the hotel for our daily meeting. Once again, I was the youngest person there. Only two other members where still in college. And despite working together for over half a year in South Dakota, I was welcomed into their circle and soon found myself in a familiar, comfortable role.

We spent a week making contacts with local officials in each of our counties. I worked with a staffer name Anna in Tangipahoa County, which contains a string of towns along U.S. Highway 55. Hammond, Independence, Amite and Kentwood were the big population centers. Some people had heard of Kentwood, La., before and were trying to figure out why it sounded familiar. The clerk at the front desk overheard us and walked over to tell us about Louisiana's favorite daughter, one Britney Spears. It turned out that Spears was born and still had a home in Kentwood. How funny it would be, we mused, to be walking around, knocking on doors for Landrieu and to have Britney Spears answer the door. Highly unlikely, we thought, but not impossible.

During the next two and a half weeks, we continued this routine. Many nights, after our meeting, we went out to a restaurant or bar and relaxed and enjoyed each other's company. Our group was made up of highly motivated and intelligent 20-somethings who had left their homes for a one-month campaign in a faraway state. I got to know these people as more than coworkers and found that they were very impressive. But most evenings, we just relaxed and had fun.

There was also another group of campaign workers who worked out of our office. They had been in South Carolina during the fall campaign and they now oversaw field work inside Baton Rouge. I met many of them and quickly developed friendships with them. In a place where no one knows any of the locals, where you work side-by-side for 12 hours a day and then socialize for the last two hours each day with the same people, you find out quickly who you get along with and who you don't. It was fortunate for us that there were never any serious problems between any of the staff and we were able to have fun no matter who was at our table.

I spent the last few days before the election exclusively in Tangipahoa putting up yard signs and making sure that our election day activities were sufficiently planned. I met a woman who volunteered to canvass with us one weekend. When I mentioned that I was looking for a place to stay in the parish so that I could avoid the hour-long commute from Baton Rouge, she insisted that I stay at her house in the guestroom. In fact, she invited me to meet the rest of her family at dinner that night. When I got back to Baton Rouge and told my friends that while they were eating at Outback Steakhouse or Ruby Tuesday's for the 10th time in two weeks, I had been treated to some Louisiana home cooking, they all groaned and decided that the only thing to take their minds off the food their mothers used to make for them was a late-night trip to the bar.

For the last two nights before the election, after working until 11 or 12 at night, I drove to her family's house. Despite my pleadings for them not to stay up, she and her husband were always awake, waiting for me to come over. And both times they had dinner saved for me and in the microwave when I walked in. I know that in addition to the adrenaline, the good food I ate during the last three days helped me get by on minimal sleep.

On election day, all of the staff fanned out to the targeted parishes. When I woke up, after two hours of sleep, my hosts were already dressed and ready to come out and help us win the election. We canvassed all day until the poll closed. First in one city, then 20 minutes up the road in another, then back down to the first city to find all the people who weren't home during the first sweep. By the time we had finished canvassing again, there were only 30 minutes left until the polls closed. Since we didn't have enough time to drive to the next target, we pulled out our cell phones and started calling from our list of voters to remind them to hurry to the polls.

As the polls closed, we got into our cars to begin the drive back home. I heard from headquarters that turnout in the most Democratic, most dense part of New Orleans was way above expected. As news of this spread, we all felt very good about Landrieu's chances. I decided not to go directly back to headquarters, but stopped off at my host family's house to say thanks. When I got there, we had one last meal together as we watched the news coverage of the race. At first, we were losing by 10 percent, but this was with only about 20 percent of the precincts reporting. Each time a few more precincts reported their returns, our deficit shrunk.

Over grilled chicken and jambalaya, I watched Landrieu be declared the winner by a margin of just under 4 percent. We said our goodbyes and I got in the car for the trip back to headquarters. I arrived to find a celebration in progress and just as I walked in the door, Landrieu began her acceptance speech. Everyone was cheering, all the way from me, the lowly field operative, to the district director, the regional director, the statewide field director, to the executive director of the state party. For a fly on the wall, it would have been hard to identify just who was who at that moment.

That night, we went out to our favorite bar. Coincidentally, the Republican operatives from the area were also there. It turned out that most of these guys had also been in South Dakota for that Senate race. Over the course of five weeks, they had been beaten by a handful of votes once and then by about 3.5 percent again, by the same field organization. The two groups were cordial and respectful, more so than I think I would have anticipated. They were dismayed and tired; we were excited but not intent on rubbing their noses in our win.

The next morning, we packed up at the hotel and drove to New Orleans. This was my second time in the city; the first time had been just before Thanksgiving when we had our Thanksgiving dinner at Ruby Tuesday's. This time we got a hotel blocks from Bourbon Street and proceeded to celebrate the win. Almost all of the staff from the rest of the state descended on the city that evening. In one club, I asked the emcee to give a shout out to South Dakota and South Carolina. He looked at me with disbelief and I smiled and told him to give it a shot. Much to his shock and the other half of the patrons in the club, fully half of the people there raised their drinks into the air and screamed. Needless to say, we enjoyed ourselves for a couple of days before finally saying our goodbyes and heading out on our different roots home.

Fulbright Scholar returns from Russia

Rae Purcell—The Bucknellian

Associate Professor of Geography Karen Morin is a Fulbright Scholar. She spent three months last fall in Russia giving weekly lectures at Nizhni Novgorod State University on different aspects of cultural geography.

Associate Professor of Geography Karen Morin returned to the United States in November after spending three months as a Fulbright Scholar in Russia, accompanied by her husband and two children.

Morin gave a weekly lecture at Nizhni Novgorod State University, located in Nizhni Novgorod, Russia, formerly known as Gorky. The different topics included aspects of cultural geography like the symbolism of monuments, gender roles and the American West.

Students were inquisitive about the topics of her lectures, as well as gender issues and American society.

"What they usually wanted to hear about was gender issues, especially wondering what I thought about gender relations in Russia as compared with the United States, and regardless of the topic I had been lecturing about," Morin said. "They also seemed interested in anything American, even the most mundane topics, such as American holidays and things like weddings. I tried to build some time in for these questions."

In general, Morin said that the Russians were very warm and inviting to her and her family. The city had been a closed city until 1991, and for many people her family was among the first Americans they had ever met. They were eager to ask her family questions. Morin's family gave a talk at a high school one day and enjoyed sharing information about the United States.

"The Russians received me with enthusiasm and were very welcoming. They seemed interested in what I had to say. That was a really pleasant experience, very enjoyable as a professor," Morin said. "When I finished a lecture, several hands would immediately go up—I just don't get that kind of response here, either in class or at conferences. It was very gratifying."

The students were also very interested by the symbolism of monuments and buildings. Morin said that the difference between the monuments in Russia and the United States is that the Russians appear to have more monuments in honor of literary figures and scientists, whereas in the United States military figures are more common. The class also discussed the symbolic nature of buildings such as the World Trade Center.

Morin was impressed with the high caliber of students that she found in the International Relations department at Nizhni Novgorod State University.

"As a University professor, I've always appreciated how smart Bucknell students are, but yet they seem to be very narrowly educated compared to the Russian students I interacted with," Morin said. "They came into the university very broadly educated in history, literature, music—they were just very knowledgeable in a well-rounded way. They could recite poetry off the cuff, and these were students majoring in international relations. I learned a lot from them in that sense; they were very enthusiastic and eager to learn. They always had questions."

While in Russia, Morin also sat on three conference panels. She said that conferences in Russia were less formal than those in the United States. Morin found the audience to be very interested and open to dialoguing about the topics.

"I loved going to conferences there because people really wanted to debate the issues, they were very engaged and seemed truly interested in solving social problems, to the point they'd get in yelling matches with one other," Morin said. "This is not typical of a conference here—I wish we were as passionate about our work. As an outsider, I found it refreshing, but no doubt that model has its own problems."

For the conferences, Morin had to use an interpreter. She discovered how large an obstacle a language barrier can be, especially in a debate.

"I also found out how tedious it is to use an interpreter, especially as a participant on a conference panel, trying to participate. You're once-removed from the conversation—hearing everything twice and behind in the conversation at all times. I gained a new sympathy for people who always have to use them," Morin said.

Nizhni Novgorod has been experiencing economic uncertainty as a result of the collapse of the U.S.S.R. It is the third largest city in Russia as well as a major industrial center, but it is still economically turbulent. Morin saw the effects of the transition to a market economy.

"From my limited experience and conversations I had with people over there, it seems that most are worse off now than they were 10 years ago. There's a new poverty, especially among the elderly. Wages are pathetically low, even for professors and doctors, and most people seem barely able to make ends meet," Morin said. "The elderly seem to be looking back to the Stalin years with nostalgia, because they had more social security then than they do now. There's an emerging wealthy business class, but for most, things are very uncertain with this turn towards the market economy."

Morin found her experience as a Fulbright Scholar rewarding—for herself and also as a growing experience for her entire family. Some of the cultural aspects that they explored were a variety of museums.

"We did a lot of things that we don't take the time to do here. We went to museums constantly, of all sorts. Andrey Sakharov, the dissident nuclear physicist, was exiled to this city in 1980, and his apartment has been turned into a museum, complete with all the KGB spy cameras he endured," Morin said. "There are numerous museums to Maxim Gorky in the city, the writer whom Stalin ha named the city after."

Morin lived three blocks from an opera house, which her family attended almost weekly. She said that it was very much part of the mainstream culture.

"Opera is very popular in Nizhni Novgorod—kids would get dropped off at the opera house like we would drop our kids off at the movies. And it's a 'people's opera,' very inexpensive, participatory and nationalistic," Morin said. "Most of the works performed seemed to feature Russian composers, especially Tchaikovsky. One of the most enjoyable aspects for me was the performing arts."

Although there were many pleasant parts of the trip, Morin said that other parts were a struggle for her and her family.

"There were really wonderful aspects to it, but it was also very challenging on a day-to-day basis. There are things we all loved about Russia but there were also just real challenges—inconsistent heat and inconsistent hot water—or lack of it for weeks at a time," Morin said. "It was very cold, and dark. It was 23 degrees below zero [Celsius] when we left and this was in the end of November."

Despite these hardships, Morin felt the trip was beneficial for her family.

"I think [the children] really matured a lot, living in the challenging circumstances. And we bonded quite a bit more than we usually do because we had more time together. It was a personal benefit of the Fulbright," Morin said.

The trip was valuable to Morin as a geographer.

"As a geographer, it's just good to experience other places, and as many as possible. It's a cliché but a true one, that the real benefit of travel is better understanding yourself, and home," Morin said.

Morin's bachelor and doctoral degrees are from the University of Nebraska-Lincoln, and her master's degree is from Bowling Green State University. She joined the University in 1995.

The Fulbright Scholar Award was established in 1946 by Arkansas Senator William Fulbright to create common understanding between the United States and other countries. Morin is one of approximately 800 Fulbright Scholars traveling to 140 countries throughout the 2002-03 academic year.

Satellite allows astronomers to obtain precise measurements

By Kyle Lange
Writer

Astronomers announced that recent observations from Wilkinson Microwave Anisotropy Probe (WMAP) have offered a more precise estimate for the age of the universe—it is 13.7 billion years old, with a 1 percent margin of error.

The WMAP satellite measures the temperature of astronomical microwaves within one-millionth of a degree. These microwaves began to permeate the universe after the formation of hydrogen, 380,000 years after the big bang. By measuring the temperature of the microwave radiation, WMAP provided a baby picture of the universe.

According to Science News, scientists were able to determine the age of the universe by analyzing the size of warmer and cooler clusters of microwave radiation. Since WMAP has a resolution 33 times better than its predecessor, the Cosmic Background Explorer (COBE), this measurement of the age of the universe is much more accurate than previous measurements.

Associate Professor of Physics Jeff Bowen, acquainted with those who worked on the COBE project, emphasized the importance of the WMAP observations.

"This is superconfirmation of general relativity and the big-bang model," Bowen said.

In addition to confirming general relativity and the big-bang model, WMAP provided valuable information on the composition of the universe. By analyzing microwave temperature fluctuations, scientists also showed that only 4 percent of the universe is made up of material that we consider matter, namely our familiar atoms and molecules. The universe is primarily composed of more exotic stuff: dark matter and dark energy.

Nearly one quarter of the universe (23 percent) is composed of dark matter. Bowen admitted that the properties of dark matter are relatively unknown.

"Dark matter is stuff with mass that does not interact with photons like normal matter," Bowen said. "If you heat it up, it does not emit radiation."

Scientists have not yet been able to detect dark matter itself, but have seen its gravitational effects. Stars and galaxies appear to be effected by gravitational forces that indicate the existence of hidden, undetectable matter.

The remainder (73 percent) of the universe is made up of dark energy, a massless antigravity. Dark energy has also not been directly detected by scientists, but its effects have been observed. Without dark energy, the universe would collapse under the force of gravity, resulting in a "big crunch" (the opposite of the big bang).

The WMAP results also showed that the first light appeared in the universe 200 million years after the big bang. Before this time, the universe was so dense that any light would be absorbed by the surrounding matter before it traveled. Since that time, radiation has had free reign to travel throughout the cosmos.

These findings surprised most cosmologists, whose models predict the formation of the first stars at a much later time in the evolution of the universe.

Perhaps WMAP's most useful data came in its measurement of the polarization of the microwaves in the universe. WMAP has instruments to detect the orientation of microwaves in a given direction. Different theories of the origin of the universe predict different polarizations for the microwaves.

According to Science News, WMAP's polarization measurements eliminated all current models except for an inflationary model that predicts that the universe experienced a tremendous expansion due to dark energy in the first infinitesimal fraction of a second after the big bang.

Assistant Professor of Physics Ned Ladd explained how scientists determine the validity of a model.

"It's the idea of the last man standing," Ladd said. "Einstein's theory of general relativity is universally accepted because it explains what other theories cannot."

Scientists hope that over the next three years WMAP will provide them with more information on the inflationary model. Initially launched in 2001, WMAP has been taking data from the opposite side of the moon. Its location shields it from microwave radiation emitted by humans and the sun. This makes it an ideal vantage point to observe the radiation left over from the big bang.

This heralds a new age for the field of cosmology. In the past, cosmologists have not been able to obtain precise measurements due to the limitations of their equipment. WMAP's results have allowed cosmologists to eliminate erroneous theories and work on fine-tuning the inflationary model. In addition, they will now focus their efforts in trying to explain the twin enigmas of dark matter and dark energy.

SAMS dancers rock around the clock to raise money for cause

Students have fun at the Students Against Multiple Sclerosis (SAMS) 24-hour marathon dance fundraiser. The dance, which ran from Friday at 5 p.m. until Saturday at 5 p.m., raised over $1,500 for the National Multiple Sclerosis Society. Many student organizations pledged $30 for an hour at the dance, ensuring a steady number of dancers throughout the fundraiser. Bryan Kitch '05 and Angie Casey '05 danced for all 24 hours.

SR-71 proves rock is here to stay

Revamped rock group jammed at Uptown for large crowd on Saturday night

By Chad Flood
Senior Writer

❖ Concert Review

When The Who's Roger Daltrey first uttered the classic line, "Rock is dead, they say, long live rock," I wonder if he had bands like SR-71 in mind. Saturday night was the band's second appearance at Uptown, and once again the club was completely packed with fans hungry to hear tracks from the band's new album, "Tomorrow," as well as a few previous hits.

Having seen the band in its first performance here, I had fairly high expectations. Things have changed for the band since its last visit to the University. Two members recently quit the band, a move that could easily have destroyed the four-piece. With dedication, the remaining musicians found replacements, and were soon ready to get back on the road and prove that a little adversity would not discourage them.

My excitement for a solid evening of rock music was almost vanquished from the start; the band took the stage and began to sing to a techno-ish beat played over the speakers. Within a minute, the lights were up, the instruments were on and my fears were soon quelled as the band tore through "Tomorrow's" opening track, "They All Fall Down."

The entire show had a noticeable old-time rock 'n' roll feel to it, as the band performed several new tracks, as well as old favorites like "Politically Correct" and the song that made them famous, "Right Now," not to mention a crowd-pleasing cover of "I Want You To Want Me." The band also went back to its roots, reviving a few songs from its virtually unknown first record, in addition to one it recorded under a completely different name. Saturday was all about who SR-71 is now.

Chad Flood—The Bucknellian

SR-71's lead singer and guitarist, Mitch Allen, takes the stage at Uptown and gets personal with the crowd by joking about being a rock star. Uptown was packed with the band's excited, screaming fans Saturday night.

In addition to the music, Mitch Allen (lead-singer/guitarist) took hold of the crowd, joking about being a rock star and all of the illicit activities in which he and his band mates would be engaging in after the show. While his comments could have been seen by some as over-the-top or offensive, it seemed to me exactly what a school like the University needed—a controversial and fun event that didn't step on too many toes. If the night did nothing else, it showed that a modern-day concert-going audience can still appreciate the fundamentals of rock music, and, as a music lover, it's hard to explain how important that is.

Opera company to give spring concert

By Beth Kengeter
Staff Writer

The Bucknell Opera Company's spring production will take on a brand new format this year. A collection of portions from larger operas sung in a concert manner, the performance will be held at 8 p.m. Saturday in the Weis Center for the Performing Arts.

"This spring our performance date is more than a month earlier than usual," Associate Professor of Music and director of the Opera Company Catherine Payn said. "Since it is not possible to mount our usual type of production with such diminished rehearsal time, we are taking the opportunity to do semi-staged, concert versions of small sections of several wonderful operas we wouldn't have the personnel to produce fully."

This semester's cast includes Rachel Crane '03, Amanda Robie '03, Eric Loveland '03, Nadra Nash '03, Kyle McGee '04 and Brianne Wright '05, all of whom appreciate the new format.

"I think it will be great," McGee said. "I am very excited because we are doing some lighter musical theater numbers which we have not done in the past, while maintaining our reputation of performing difficult opera pieces as well. The combination should be entertaining for all."

Robie will be singing in her final Opera Company performance.

"It will be very much like a concert," Robie said. "Everyone will wear evening gowns and tuxes."

The first half of the program will include music from Gaetano Donizetti's "Don Pasquale," Giacomo Puccini's "Suor Angelica," Donizetti's "Daughter of the Regiment" and Puccini's "La Rondine." The second half of the show will be comprised of an extended set of solos and ensembles by George Gershwin, Cole Porter, Stephen Sondheim and Richard Rogers.

McGee will be performing in a scene from "Don Pasquale" and "Lost in the Stars" from the play of the same name.

"I have enjoyed the aria from Don Pasquale because it offered a challenge both musically and with the Italian," McGee said. "'Lost in the Stars' is a beautiful piece. It is a story really, and that makes it a great opportunity to connect with the audience."

Robie will be performing in Puccini's "Suor Angelica" and Bernstein's "Trouble in Tahiti."

"I like the Puccini because it is very dark and that's something new for me," Robie said. "I have to really get into the character. For the same reason, I really like the Bernstein. It's very much a character piece—I have to know what she's feeling."

The company will sing other pieces as well.

"In addition, this program gives the singers the opportunity to explore the songs of Gershwin, Sondheim, Porter and Rogers in the manner many opera singers are doing all over the world these days. Michael Brody of Dogwood Hill is constructing an elegant floral 'set' for the evening, which will set the tone for the program," Payn said.

Loveland thinks students will enjoy the new format.

"I think that this is a great opportunity to stimulate greater interest in the company's work," Loveland said. "Hopefully we'll be able to attract a wide variety of audience members—those who would rather see a concert than see singers act, and also individuals who have a love for musical theater but have been put off by opera for one reason or another."

The production is free and open to the public.

Kendall strings audience along

By Dave Allen
Staff Writer

❖ Concert Review

Nicolas Kendall, already an internationally acclaimed violinist at 23 years old, gave a stunning performance Friday at the Weis Center for the Performing Arts. The program ranged widely in terms of both style and time period while exhibiting his remarkable technical skill and beautiful, resonant sound.

The centerpiece of the concert was the first work after intermission. Daniel Kellogg composed "And the Dust Shall Sing Like a Bird" especially for Kendall and Pei-Yao Wang, the violinist's classmates at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia. Kendall addressed the audience after intermission to introduce the work. It was inspired by the poem "Ceremony after a Fire Raid" by Dylan Thomas.

"There's a few angry sections," Kendal said. "I can't say 'Enjoy it,' but let it speak for itself."

A recording of Thomas reading his poem was played with all stage lighting lowered before Kendall and Wang began playing. Thomas' booming voice reciting the disturbing images of war set the scene very well for the highly bracing, unsettling work. To begin the piece, Kendall's violin was a high-pitched, focused beam of sound over sparse, sometimes dissonant piano accompaniment.

Much of the piece veered back and forth between smooth, lyrical passages and frenzied attacks of both violin and piano. Kendall alternated rapid staccato bowing with urgent, drawn-out chords building to the "angry sections" of the very aggressive playing he had mentioned. The piece closed with delicate playing in the violin's very upper range, with the piano accompaniment still contributing to the undercurrent of dissonance that pervaded the entire work.

The concert's program notes listed Kendall's, as well as Wang's, many accolades. Particularly interesting were Kendall's ancestry and Wang's early development in music. Kendall's grandfather was the first string teacher to instruct students using the famed Suzuki method in the United States, and Wang began playing piano at age 5 and appeared in recital at the Taipei Cultural Center in Taiwan at age 8.

Kendall performed Peter Ilych Tchaikovsky's piece, "Meditation," from memory. The work maintained a smooth, reflective feel almost entirely throughout. Constant tempo variations pushed Kendall's playing to broad flourishes and a cadenza from the very highest range of the violin to the very bottom. As the piece came to a still, calm conclusion, Kendall demonstrated exceptional skill in sustaining long notes without wavering even slightly.

"Tin Pan Alley," the third movement of Paul Schoenfield's "Four Souvenirs," was in a laid-back jazz style, reminiscent of the works of George Gershwin. It was neither loud and frenzied nor soft and lyrical, but was a fine setup for the fast-paced final movement.

"The Square Dance," which drove the concert to the end, allowed Kendall to show off bluegrass-style fiddle playing. His playing seemed to imitate a square dance caller, careening from the extreme high end of the violin's range to the extreme low end in a jaunty, frenetic dance. He played with such fervor that a string on his bow snapped and could be seen dangling as he took his bows at the concert's end.

Aniela Rahardja '06 attended the concert because she had heard about Wang's fame as a pianist, but enjoyed Kendall's performance as well.

"[Wang] tended to draw the focus away from him [Kendall] because she moves around a lot more," Rahardja said.

After the concert, Christian Stebbins '05 expressed his enjoyment of the performance.

"I was impressed with the entire concert," Stebbins said.

Later this year, Kendall will debut as a soloist at the Kennedy Center in Washington, D.C., and at the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum in Boston.

Musician Lynn Eustis '87 will be performing at 8 p.m. on March 3 in Rooke Recital Hall at the Weis Music Building.

Formally singing with the National Opera Company, Eustis will perform several soprano pieces in her guest recital with pianist Greg Ritchey, including music by Reynaldo Hahn, Robert Schumann, Gustav Mahler, Maurice Ravel and Richard Rodgers.

Eustis is currently an assistant professor of voice at the University of North Texas College of Music. She also holds a Doctor of Music degree in opera from Florida State University and a Master of Music degree from the Curtis Institute of Music after completing a music and performance major at the University.

"Lynn was one of my first students," University Professor of Music and Director of Choral Studies William Payn said. "She sang in Rooke Chapel Choir and Concert Choral and Opera Company. It was very evident that she was going to make it as a performer."

According to Payn, Eustis performed on tour with him in England and continues to return to the Lewisburg area. More recently, Eustis sang last spring for the Susquehanna Valley Chorale and Orchestra, directed by Payn, and gave the "Messiah Performance," and an oratorical performance of "Haydn's Creation." Last fall, Eustis also sang for the memorial service of Derk, Professor of Biology Gary Sojka's son, with the University Chapel Choir.

Lynn Eustis' mother, Carol, resides in Lewisburg and eagerly awaits her daughter's upcoming performance. Both Eustis and her younger sister went to the University and sang in Chapel Choir together. Her parents moved from Long Island, N.Y., to Lewisburg as Lynn's performances in the area began to grow. Lynn's father passed away only a short time ago, and Lynn, her mother said, is living her father's dream.

"Lynn had always performed as an undergraduate at Bucknell," Carol Eustis said. "I am absolutely delighted that she is coming back—it was always her dad's dream that she would again perform back at Bucknell."

Eustis appears regularly as a soloist with organizations that include the Dallas Symphony Orchestra, Concert Royal (New York and Princeton), the Dallas Bach Society, the Atlanta Baroque Orchestra, Fort Worth Dallas Ballet, the Williamsport Symphony (Pa.) and Fort Worth Early Music, in works such as Carl Orff's "Carmina burana," Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's Mass in C Minor, George Frideric Handel's "Israel in Egypt" and Felix Mendolssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream."

Besides performing in over 30 operatic roles, she was also the First Place Winner at the Florida Suncoast Opera Guild Competition in the spring of 1998.

"Students will enjoy hearing her sing pieces such as Reynaldo Hahn and Rob Schumann. She will also be singing a German song cycle entitled "Frauenliebe Und Leben," which will be more familiar to students as well as pieces from various musicals in the early musicals of the 30s and 40s," Payn said.

> "[Lynn] has perfect pitch and a three octave range. She can sign in German, French and Italian and her diction is perfect in all of the foreign languages,"
> —Carol Eustis, mother of Lynn Eustis '87*

Many of the pieces Eustis will be performing at the University are from her performances in the Czech Republic. She plans to return this summer to the Czech Republic for a second season of solo recitals with Ritchey at the Mahler Festival.

"[Lynn] has perfect pitch and a three octave range. She can sign in German, French and Italian and her diction is perfect in all of the foreign languages," Carol Eustis said.

Payn encourages students to attend Eustis' performance, and support alumni in the performing arts.

"We really always knew that she had that extra something," Payn said. "We knew she was going to make it big."

Students start a record label

By Melinda Kummer
Arts & Entertainment Editor

In an upstairs bedroom wallpapered in Coltrane posters, furnished with guitars and boasting a library of Maxim, a record label entered the world. Notion Records, founded by Nathan Zapata '03 and Jorge Montanez '03, was started less than a year ago and will release its first album within weeks.

Not just an overnight birth, research and diligence played a large part in the founding of Notion Records. Zapata, executive producer and CEO, takes his role very seriously and expects the world to take the label seriously as well.

"We're very serious and passionate. We do this, first of all, because we love it," Zapata said.

Big dreams and devotion to music constitute the business's motto.

"I became a part of Notion Records because I have had a love of music since I was a little kid. It is more than a hobby for me—it is a passion," Montanez said. "My goal is not to be famous, but rather to be able to share my music with others. I would like to make a good song and let it go down in history to later be seen as a classic. This would make me happier than all the money in the world."

Cisco Sanchez '04, Holland Mack '06, Tunde Owalabi '03, Zohare Haider '04, Nortey Yeboah '05, John Blake '05 and Micah Wright '03 complete the company. Business meetings, events coordinating and recordings occupy their time. They echo their founders in a basic love for music.

"I'm doing this because I love rapping. I just love music," Blake said.

Yeboah also cites love for music in his reason for participating in the company.

"I'm a part of Notion Records for one simple reason: I love music and I love to sing," Yeboah said.

Notion Records' upcoming album features Mack and boasts mostly hip-hop and rap songs. Zapata, a philosophy major, sees music as an exercise in channeling art into tangible energy. In the album, with sounds influenced by Tyrese, Craig David and The Neptunes, Zapata hopes to use the mainstream sounds as a segue for listeners to a truer R&B sound.

"R&B is more specialized and I hope this sound will be appreciated by critics," Zapata said.

The music video they're planning will be shot this weekend. The finished video will be sent to MTV and BET in addition to becoming part of their promotional package.

Notion Records' five-year plan is to be signed under a major label and be respected as a record company. In an industry that is not kind to newcomers, Notion Records refuses to be discouraged by critics.

"People can look at us from the outside and say, 'What are they trying to do? Why do they care?' But they need to realize that there's a certain amount of training that goes into producing records," Zapata said. "If they can't give me an opportunity to grab their attention, to listen to our music it doesn't matter—we're doing this for ourselves."

A Web site is in the works. Keep checking www.notionrecords.com for the latest on the up-and-coming label.

Nathan Zapata '03 and Jorge Montanez '03 perform as part of Notion Records. The students have formed an independent record label and hope to film their first music video this weekend with a song from their new album.

Andrew Burr '04 releases album

Lyrics to "The Seeker":

Cabs drive by the courts
All empty in the cold
Like Sunday people
In hats and coats

A man jogs by a music maker
Breathing rhythm all around
Up and down
Newspaper blow
Buildings tall as stone
They scrape the sky

And all I see around
Is sorrow in this goddamn town
I think I'm lost
I may be

❖ CD Review

Tranquil, pleasant and soothing.

"Kalmia," the debut album of Andrew Burr '04, creates a mixture of technical guitar sounds with harmonious, relaxing vocals. The light sound of guitars, piano, congas and vocals create a dreamlike, comforting sound that could lull someone into a deep sleep.

The album consists of seven ballads featuring Burr's technical composition between acoustic and electric guitars along with his harmonic vocals. Through his songwriting abilities, Burr captures listeners' attention, drawing the audience into his work.

Notable songs on "Kalmia" that demonstrate this combination between guitar and vocals include "The Seeker," "Sinkin' In" and "In the End/Suns of Light." Although there are only seven songs on the album, the major songs are seven or more minutes in length, with exception of "Shadow" and "Sinkin' In." These long songs slowly develop and progress through multiple stages of sounds, keeping the listener continually guessing as to what will come next.

Aside from Burr's brilliant work featured on the album, many musicians form his accompaniment, including Jarred Butto '02, Jeff Clark '03, Sara Close '05, Adam Johnson, Luke Morris '03 and Kim Reichley.

"Kalmia" is a compilation of slow, progressive ballads that feature dreamlike sequences, as well as more captivating parts. Anyone interested in acoustic guitar and softer rock should listen to the album. Contact Andrew at aburr@bucknell.edu for more information.

Roth residents read at Bucknell Hall

By Kristi Johnston
Senior Writer

Adrian Oktenberg and Brian Teare may not be household names for most students, but they are certainly familiar to those who follow up-and-coming poets. Both poets have amassed respect and acclaim from the literary community, and the University has the privilege of counting them among its Philip Roth residents. As such, the two delivered a poetry reading Sunday night in Bucknell Hall.

Associate Professor of English Cynthia Hogue introduced each poet to the small but enthusiastic audience, noting that the reading was "a celebration of our Roth residents … and of the program itself."

The Philip Roth Residence in Creative Writing is an annual award given to a promising writer in order for him or her to complete a first or second book at the University. The award is named for Philip Roth '54, a distinguished and well-known author.

Oktenberg was the first poet to read. She received the Roth residency in 1998, and now resides in Northampton, Mass. The poems she read came from one of her two collections of poetry, "The Bosnia Elegies" and "Swimming with Dolphins," which was published in 2002 by University Press.

Hogue commented on Oktenberg's creative writing style.

"The poems surprise us into attentiveness," Hogue said.

Oktenberg chose to begin her reading with an anti-war poem from "The Bosnia Elegies" describing the life of a civilian.

"After all, it's civilians who are affected most by these wars," Oktenburg said.

She followed with poems from "Swimming with Dolphins," including "The Creation," "The Adoration" and "Aster's September." She then returned to "The Bosnia Elegies," reading a poem based on the song "Shenandoah."

Oktenberg's next poem, "Sunday Morning," was based on her college relationship with noted author Kathleen Norris. She finished her segment with the poem "Swimming with Dolphins," cited by the University Press' Web site as "a bold exploration of erotic possibilities between women and, at the same time, a lush evocation of the natural world."

Current Roth resident Teare then took the podium for his reading, which Hogue said represented his tendency to be "both metaphysical and metatextual." Before coming to the University, Teare was a Ruth Lily Fellow at the University of Indiana and a Wallace Stegner Fellow at Stanford University. His first book, "The Room Where I Was Born," is due out this fall.

Teare said his poems were about mourning and a new relationship.

"My poems themselves aren't necessarily about telling stories," Teare said.

Teare began with an elegy to the late poet John Weiners entitled "Of a Sleeping Man and a Second Man Awake." He continued with several poems about living in California, which he said depicted both emotional confusion and what he considered to be an unusual landscape, such as "Californian," "Two Elegies Containing Fear" and "Moving On."

He then switched gears, reading poems based on a new relationship. "Sub-Zero" reflected on the idea of certainty and how to judge whether or not something is real. Teare also joked that the title was "in honor of [our] fair climate."

He closed his reading with an erotic love poem, "Californian."

Organizers were pleased with the reading and noted the importance of the Roth residency.

"Writers in this program have gone on to other fellowships and national-level writing careers," Hogue said. "Our students benefit from hearing and having the opportunity to work with writers of this caliber. As two 'out' poets, [Oktenberg and Teare] also affirmed the Stadler [Poetry] Center's longstanding commitment, excellence and diversity."

House Party to be held next weekend with new restrictions

Jimmie's Chicken Shack will be playing at Phi Kappa Psi Fraternity on Saturday of House Party weekend. Currently, six bands are scheduled to play at the University during the weekend.

University House Party 2003 festivities begin Friday, March 28 at the conclusion of Greek Week. Sponsored primarily by the Interfraternity Council (IFC) and Panhellenic (Panhel) Council, students can expect similar rules and fees from last year's annual event.

Many fraternities will sponsor bands, food and beverages all weekend long with most events taking place along Fraternity Road. Confirmed bands include Aranka Fabian, Bomb Squad, Giants of Science, Jimmie's Chicken Shack, Kickover and Right Foot Red, according to IFC Special Events Chair Justin Lyon '05.

"Within a week, IFC hopes to make a definite schedule that can be placed online on the IFC Web site as well as posters and handouts for House Party attendees so they know what events are going on," Lyon said.

Tentative times of performances include Kappa Sigma Fraternity's Giants of Science Friday at 10 p.m. Jimmie's Chicken Shack will perform 1-4 p.m. Saturday at Phi Kappa Psi Fraternity, followed by Sigma Alpha Epsilon Fraternity's Right Foot Red performing at 10 p.m.

"House Party is a great event because it showcases the strength of our Greek life and how it can bring the entire campus together," Garrett Carlough '04 said.

All students are required to register for House Party. For first-year students, registration begins Thursday, March 27 from 5-8 p.m. in the fieldhouse at the Greek Week Carnival. Upperclassman can find House Party registration and 21-year-old wristband distribution in Walls Lounge Friday from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. After Friday at 5 p.m. registration will take place in the Fraternity Road hospitality tent until 1 a.m. Saturday registration begins at noon in the hospitality tent and lasts until midnight. During registration students and guests will receive House Party wristbands. All guests must be at least 18 years old.

Class of '06 to enroll for fall courses online

By Jeff Day
Staff Writer

The Class of 2006 will pilot a new online registration process this year for class enrollment for the fall semester. A separate BANNER Registration PIN will be available from student's advisers March 24 and once activated will allow individuals to register for classes online throughout the entire enrollment week.

According to Gretchen Perry, '06, the first-year students were chosen to participate due to the lower likelihood of required permission for admittance or other Registrar's staff intervention.

It was also expressed that because the Class of 2006 will have the most opportunities to use the system, it is most efficient to teach them first.

"The Class of 2006 was chosen as they will be at the University for the next three years and should fully realize the benefits of the adjustments that will be made to the process as it evolves," Vice President for Enrollment Management Kurt Thiede said.

Online registration will be an optional procedure for members of the Class of 2006. For those students that do not wish to participate, the Registrar's Office will remain open throughout the week to enlist students in classes.

According to Thiede, the personal attention that students receive from the Registrar's Office is an important value of the current program. For those students needing help in negotiating a list of closed courses, the staff has always been and must continue to be available for help.

> "The Class of 2006 was chosen as they will be at the University for the next three years and should fully realize the benefits of the adjustments that will be made to the process at it evolves."

"I imagine how frustrating it could be to be presented a series of 'error' messages by some 'faceless' machine. The opportunity to work out difficult situations with another human being is something that we do not want to lose completely through this conversion to on-line," Thiede said.

This trial period will help determine the most effective way to introduce online registration to the entire campus if successful.

Gadd, 55, passes away after lengthy battle with cancer

Former Head Football Coach Tom Gadd passed away in his Lewisburg home on March 1 after a lengthy battle with brain cancer.

Gadd, who was a week away from his 56th birthday, was a beloved member of the University community during his seven years at the helm of the football program, and will be sorely missed.

"Tom Gadd was an extraordinary member of the Bucknell community," University President Steffen Rogers. "He will be remembered as one of the finest football coaches Bucknell has ever seen."

Gadd was initially diagnosed with a brain tumor in January 2001, and although the tumor was successfully removed, it returned in the summer of 2002, rendering him unable to coach the team during this past season.

He began his career at the University in 1994, when he took over as head coach of a football program that had only had one winning season in the previous 14 years. His magic touch was evident immediately, as he led the team to a 7-4 record in his first season and a Patriot League Championship in his second year.

Over the course of his career with the Bison, the team never had a losing record and strung together seven consecutive winning seasons for the first time in the program's history.

In 1997, he guided the squad to the only 10-win season in the University's history, which was good enough to merit a national top-20 ranking. During the same year, Gadd was named Patriot League Coach of the Year, and was also a finalist for the Eddie Robinson Award for Division I-AA Coach of the Year.

During the 2001 season, Gadd joined Bob Curtis in a tie for the most victories under a Bucknell coach with 48 wins. He was also the fastest coach in University history to reach that plateau.

"Tom came to Bucknell with more than 20 years of coaching experience at major Division I programs, and he was able to re-establish the proud tradition of winning football at Bucknell, Director of Athletics and Recreation John Hardt said.

While his accomplishments on the field were legendary, Gadd will probably be best remembered for his leadership, enthusiasm and energy, as well as for the work ethic and values that he instilled on his players.

Gadd graduated from University of California-Riverside in 1970, where he also began his coaching career as a defensive coordinator from 1972-1973. Over the next several years he contributed to programs at Long Beach State, University of Utah, University of South Carolina—where his Gamecocks where ranked as high as second in the nation in 1984—University of Minnesota and San Jose State University.

He then joined the Bucknell's program, immediately finding his niche in the University and Lewisburg communities. Gadd, an enthusiastic supporter of all Bucknell athletics, earned the respect of his players, fellow coaches and everyone else whose lives he touched.

"Coach Gadd and Bucknell University and the town of Lewisburg all meshed perfectly," Hardt said. "The result is a legacy that will always be remembered, and a foundation that will forever impact Bison Football."

STUDENT PARKING INCREASED

Adam Wilcox—The Bucknellian

Fifty parking spaces in the Farm Lot that were formerly designated as faculty parking were reallocated as student parking spaces. The change implemented by the University parking committee is a result of a Bucknell Student Government study that documented that the majority of the spaces were unused. The spaces will be available for student use until the construction of the new engineering building begins.

Secretary Tom Ridge, U.S. Department of Homeland Security

YOU'VE PROBABLY WONDERED,

"IS THERE ANYTHING WE CAN DO TO PROTECT OURSELVES FROM THE THREAT OF TERRORISM?"

HERE'S YOUR ANSWER.

You do not have to feel helpless in the face of terrorist threats against the United States. You can take action and be prepared.

STEP ONE - MAKE AN EMERGENCY SUPPLY KIT

All of us should be able to survive comfortably on our own for at least a three-day period. That's the amount of time you may need to remain in your home, until the danger from a biological, chemical or radiological attack has passed.

Obviously, you'll need a change of clothes, sleeping bags, food and water. A gallon of water per person per day should be enough. Canned and dried foods are easy to store and prepare.

Start now by gathering basic emergency supplies: a flashlight, a battery-powered radio, extra batteries, a first-aid kit, prescription medicines and toilet articles. Duct tape and heavy-duty plastic garbage bags can be used to seal windows and doors.

STEP TWO - MAKE A FAMILY COMMUNICATIONS PLAN

Your family may not be together at home when an attack occurs. Make sure everyone knows how to get in touch. It may be wise to have everyone call an out-of-state friend or relative.

Keep a list of emergency numbers near the phone. Select a room where everyone can gather. The best choice is an interior room above ground with few windows and doors.

Keep at least half a tank of gas in your car at all times in case you're told to evacuate during an emergency. If you do not have a car, plan what to do if you are asked to leave.

STEP THREE - BE INFORMED

Planning helps. If your family knows what to expect, all of you will be calmer in the aftermath of a terrorist event. For example, you should find out where to turn for instructions. Local authorities will broadcast information as quickly as possible concerning the nature of the emergency and what you should do next. Be sure to keep listening for updates.

What can you do right now? You can get more information and educate yourself and your family. For more details on emergency preparedness, visit our website at www.ready.gov. Or get a free brochure by calling 1-800-BE-READY.

According to a campus report published last month, the University's 2001-2002 expenditures generated a total financial impact of over $155 million on the local community. This figure does not take into account the spending done by students or annual visitors.

In direct expenditures alone, the University spent nearly $95 million in the last year. This money was distributed among salaries, the cost of goods and services, expenditures of various facilities and equipment, health care and state and local taxes.

The flow of money into the local community has a larger impact than its direct monetary value.

According to the financial impact statement, "that $95 million generates additional spending in the community."

In order to calculate the full financial impact of the University's spending, the expenditure must be multiplied by 1.64, as prescribed by the Pennsylvania Economy League. Using this multiplier formula, the University determined its full financial impact to exceed $155 million.

"Of course we are contributing to the community in a number of different ways in terms of the intellectual environment of the region and the arts and other programming, but sometimes the community misses the concept that we are also a very large industry and that we are contributing to the well-being of the community financially as well as intellectually," University President Steffen Rogers said. "It is very important to us that people do understand all the contributions that the University is making."

The bulk of campus expenditures consisted of faculty, staff and student wages. Together, students and University employees earned $52.6 million.

"Our budgets are probably larger than many universities of our size because we do provide an across-the-board services and the number of employees we have," Rogers said.

The remaining breakdown of the figure is as follows: $16.9 million in goods and services, $19.1 million in facilities and equipment, $6.1 million in health care expenses and $2 million in taxes.

The University's Small Business Development Center also provides additional stimulation of the economy, assisting in the creation or retention of 3,500 jobs since 1978.

"We are also contributing through spending; we buy things in the region and, therefore, we are supporting the economy," Rogers said.

Rogers noted the influence of the University's service work and volunteer programs on the area, but also stressed the mutual impact of the relationship.

"It is very important that we don't overlook the fact that the community contributes. Many of the people in the community come to our events. They contribute to our crowds at the Weis Center or theater or sporting events," Rogers said.

As Rogers said, the financial impact statement is a document that clearly indicates the contributions made by campus.

"It is also important to us that the state realizes the importance of higher education, because even though we are private, we do receive state support. This brochure is just a reminder that we can send out to say, 'Yes, we appreciate everything the state is doing for us, but it is a reciprocal relationship,'" Rogers said.

In order to receive a 21-year-old wristband that also includes the official House Party mug, University students must present both their Bucknell ID and valid driver's license. Guests also need a valid license.

The Office of Greek Life as well as IFC and Panhel set the prices for registration fees. This year the fees for sorority women are $5, non-Greek Bucknell students $10, alumni $10 and all other guests $20. Different from last year, fraternity members do not have to pay for their wristband since their houses already fund the bands and events. Guests must be registered with University students, who are then responsible for their guests. Non-Greeks are allowed up to two guests and Greeks are allowed up to four guests per person. Alumni are considered guests of current students.

Although, conceivably, there could be more than double the student population at House Party, the Office of Greek Life is not concerned with crowding.

"Including guests we don't expect more than 4,000 people participating in House Party events because some Bucknell students choose not to participate. Guests are the responsibility of the student; the student registers his or her guests, so that student is responsible. That system has worked well in the past," Assistant Director of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Shauna Irwin said.

House Party is not a profit-making event for the University or IFC. The money raised from registration will fund additional security, mugs for those over 21 years old, alternative beverages and food stationed along Fraternity Road and other facility needs. Irwin expects the total cost of hosting House Party to reach $9,000. All bands are completely funded by fraternities and sometimes cosponsored with sororities. Greek chapters do not receive any of the funds raised from registration.

"Fraternities are also expected to provide alternative beverages and food and comply with the usual University risk management policies. IFC and Panhel have paid for the food around Frat Row," Carlough said.

The other concern for the organizers of House Party is the weather. Last year Lewisburg experienced a March snowstorm on the Friday of House Party weekend.

"We just hope the weather is good so outside events can continue as scheduled," Carlough said.

This year the Office of Greek Life expects to spend approximately $3,000 in security alone including hiring a private security company, having an ambulance on call all weekend, as well as additional support from the borough police department.

There will be at least two beverage stations and one food station along Fraternity Road. In addition to the food and drink tents alongside Fraternity Road, Panhel is sponsoring a barbecue open to the campus on Saturday afternoon.

"Due to strict national and local bylaws, the sororities are often limited in what they can do in terms of funding House Party. The fraternities on a national level are not as strict," Irwin said.

For the first time Panhel decided to sponsor food on Saturday as another way for sororities to contribute to House Party.

"Since we do not contribute financially to House Party because of our alcohol initiative policies, the women this year have voted for and are in the midst of organizing a free outdoor food venue on Saturday afternoon or evening. The time and details of location are yet to be decided. This will be in conjunction with the traditional food supply that is offered in the evening," Panhellenic President Jen Mellon '04 said. "We felt that the Saturday afternoon of House Party is a time when there is little food offered, besides the Bison and Cafeteria. We look forward to contributing to safety and enjoyment of House Party by offering more opportunities for students and guests to eat throughout the day. The Panhellenic women are very excited to have a safe and enjoyable House Party."

> "House Party is a great event because it showcases the strength of our Greek life and how it can bring the entire campus together."
> —Garrett Carlough '04

Unlike past years, this year there is a two-person administrative team to oversee Greek affairs consisting of Irwin and Assistant Dean of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Lewis Marrara. House Party novices, they look forward to students enjoying the event.

"I have heard both good and bad stories [about House Party]. It will be nice to see the event for myself and form my own opinions," Irwin said.

Although they have never attended the event, both have worked hard to prepare for a safe and fun weekend.

"Both [Irwin and Marrara] have been working extremely hard, staying in the office until late at night. They're great to work with because they are very laid back and approachable," Lyon said. "As far as adapting to the University, I personally was impressed how up-to-date both of them were on how things were run around here and how Dean Marrara seemed to mesh with the other administration and faculty having just taken the position a month or so ago."

Irwin believes that with a two-person Greek Life Office the staff will be better equipped to handle problems as well and does not force one person to oversee the entire event.

"[The Deans of Students] are committed to students enjoying their collegiate careers. It is helpful to have two people on staff for Greek Life because it adds additional people who are committed to being involved with fraternities and sororities," Irwin said.

Despite rumors, there are no immediate plans to discontinue the popular spring tradition.

"The continuance of [House Party] is contingent upon a variety of people being mindful of what it is supposed to be. It's not a free-for-all. Various people need to realize their roles in making the event successful including students, Greek organizations, staff and guests," Irwin said. "I don't expect any major issues, but people need to realize if there is just one major problem, that could be the event [that ends House Party's future]."

will take greater advantage of this technology to improve on our already efficient and effective registration process," Thiede said.

The Registrar's Office is anticipating and encouraging feedback to allow students to express their feelings about the entire process. Bucknell Student Government will also conduct a survey to poll students about their experiences using such a method for registration.

"I think there may be some technical problems associated with online enrollment, but if it works, it would be a welcomed change," Bradley Nocco '06 said.

Bucknell is not the first institution with a Banner software system designed for online registration, so it has had the opportunity to learn from other's mistakes.

The biggest concern that exists, as with launching any new program, is the one that remains unknown.

The committees responsible for online enrollment have continued to stress that registration is a combination of key decisions and administrative processes.

"The less energy expended on those administrative processes that a machine can manage, the more energy can be put into assisting students with making key decisions," Thiede said.

The University is very excited to offer online opportunities, and is confident that students will continue to find the Registrar's Office helpful and informative. According to Thiede, the online registration process will bring together technological efficiencies with a commitment to friendly, personal attention.

Senate votes against arctic drilling

WASHINGTON—By a 52-48 vote, the Senate on Tuesday defeated an attempt to open part of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling. With war looming in Iraq, proponents of drilling, most of them Republicans, had focused on energy security as they tried to lift a congressional ban on drilling in the refuge.

Clue may point to cause of illness

Researchers reported Wednesday that at least some victims of a fast-moving disease emanating from Asia appear to be infected by a strain of virus related to those that cause mumps and measles. As scientists raced to identify the cause of the illness, the U.S. government was investigating 11 suspected cases in the United States. Meanwhile, officials said some of the early atypical pneumonia patients may have caught the disease in a Hong Kong hotel.

Mexico tightens security at U.S. border

MEXICO CITY—Mexico said on Tuesday it had deployed some 18,000 troops to increase security on its porous border with the United States and protect strategic installations against terrorism as war in Iraq looms.

Switzerland bans U.S. military planes from airspace

BERN—Switzerland banned American and other military planes from its airspace during the war in Iraq, expressing regret the United States acted without U.N. approval. The airspace ban is similar to one enacted during the 1991 Gulf War—although Switzerland did allow some U.S. ambulance flights to cross during that conflict. Airlines prepare for fewer passengers.

Flights suspended worldwide

CHICAGO—Airlines around the world suspended some flights, rerouted others and swapped in smaller planes on Wednesday in anticipation of a sharp decline in passengers during an Iraqi war. The degree of flight and cost-cutting varied from region to region, with executives waiting for solid indications of the war's intensity and duration before making further adjustments.

Abbas accepts Palestinian prime minister post

RAMALLAH, West Bank—Pragmatist and moderate Mahmoud Abbas accepted the position of Palestinian prime minister Wednesday in the first real promise of ending the bloody Israeli-Palestinian deadlock of 30 months. The Palestinian parliament overwhelmingly ratified the post of prime minister and gave it powers beyond those sought by Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

Thailand expels eight Iraqis, cites security fears

BANGKOK—Thailand said on Thursday it was expelling another eight Iraqis, including one with links to Iraqi President Saddam Hussein, on grounds of national security as the United States began an attack on Iraq. The move brings to 11 the number of Iraqis expelled from Thailand this week.

Sorority sisters sponsor rape presentation

Alpha Chi Omega and Delta Delta Delta bring "Kristin's Story" to the University

By Jennifer Jenchura
Senior Writer

The sisters of Alpha Chi Omega (Alpha Chi) and Delta Delta Delta (Tridelta) sororities co-sponsored the presentation "Kristin's Story: A Story of Acquaintance Rape and Depression" on March 4 in the Weis Center. Andrea Cooper last presented "Kristin's Story" to the University in 1999.

"Kristin's Story" recounts a young woman's acquaintance rape and subsequent suicide as told by her mother. College student Kristin Cooper committed suicide on New Year's Eve 1995.

The Alpha Chi Omega Foundation, Kristin's sorority, and the Delta Delta Delta Foundation, Andrea's sorority, are the national sponsors of this proactive, coeducational rape education program.

Coordinated by Samantha Berthod '04 of Tridelta and assisted by Emily Berger '04 of Alpha Chi Omega, the planning for the event began last fall.

"Last year, the Bucknell Tridelta chapter had a visit from our national field consultant and she raved about Mrs. Cooper's program and strongly recommend that we bring it to Bucknell again," Tridelta Vice President of Public Relations Samantha Berthod '04 said. "Once she was suggested, Tridelta got the ball rolling and Alpha Chi was very interested in participating. The cosponsorship went extremely well, Tridelts and Alpha Chis at Bucknell have a very strong mutual respect for one another."

Both Alpha Chi Omega and Delta Delta Delta said Andrea Cooper was the motivating force in the two sororities working together to promote the issues for which they had such strong feelings.

"The 'Kristin's Story' program is a great representation of the relationships that develop between sororities," Alpha Chi Omega President Angel Gabler '04 said. "This nationally-started program gave us an opportunity to bring our local chapters closer together. Andrea Cooper was a great speaker for the issues and also a motivator in bringing our two sororities closer together."

Delta Delta Delta President Katie Michaels '04 agrees that cosponsorship between sororities is another way to strengthen both the Panhellenic Council and the University community.

"We felt that based on the involvement of both sororities, it would be an excellent opportunity to join forces and work together on such an important issue. Cosponsorship of a program such as 'Kristin's Story' differs from the co-sponsorship of a social event because it offers the community the opportunity to learn about serious issues such as suicide and rape told from a personal perspective," Michaels said. "It reveals an effort to improve unity and awareness throughout all chapters, not just within one specific sorority. We hope to have many opportunities in the future to cosponsor similar events that will have a lasting impact on the Bucknell community."

Over the past six years, Cooper has spoken to more than 50,000 people about the death of her daughter. She very much enjoyed being back at the University for the second time.

"Bucknell is my favorite school to speak at," Cooper said.

Cooper has made it her personal mission to educate women and men all over the nation about rape and suicide. She also strives to bring men up-to-date with the problem of rape and hopes to prepare them for the possibility of a friend or family member's rape. Kristin's serious boyfriend broke up with her when she revealed her rape, and Cooper believes it contributed significantly to her depression.

"I steered Kristin into a place with a good Greek system, little did I know that in a year and three months later she would be dead," said Cooper. "I never dreamed I'd lose my child to suicide."

Kristin, who was a sophomore at Baker University, a small Kansas school in which 56 percent of the student body is involved in the Greek program, when she died in 1995. She was described as a vibrant and happy young woman until the fall of 1995, when friends and family noticed signs of her depression.

"I am sharing this because I hope by telling Kristin's story that other lives will be saved, and other young women will not be victims of acquaintance rape."
—Andrea Cooper

Cooper thought her daughter was upset about a recent breakup with her boyfriend, but she found out later that there was a much more serious problem. Kristin had been raped.

Despite a friend's encouragement to go to the police or share the news with her parents or a counselor, Kristin drifted into a state of depression.

Months passed before she realized she could no longer deal with the pain and subsequently committed suicide on New Year's Eve.

"Kristin is frozen in time in my memory as a college student. I wasn't able to help my daughter. But if I can help one person in this audience than it was worth the trip," Cooper said.

Cooper presented the troubling statistics about rape in college-age students and suicide among people under the age 30. She indicated that acquaintance rape is the most underreported violent crime in the nation and that studies indicate that 46 percent of victims never tell anyone.

The FBI estimates that one in three women will be raped in her lifetime, and one woman is raped every two minutes in the United States. According to the FBI, one in four college women are victims of rape or attempted rape.

"More than 50 percent of female college students have experienced sexual aggression from an acquaintance; one in four college women are victims of rape. Ninety-two percent of the time when a women reports a rape she's telling the truth. If someone comes to you and tells you that they were raped, believe them—if you don't, it's like being victimized again," Cooper said.

Mounting concern about sexual assault incidents at the University prompted the sponsoring sororities to bring Cooper to campus.

"As a sorority, Tridelta is very concerned with sexual assault on campus. It was very important to me personally to make sure that we as a sorority do our part on campus to educate ourselves about sexual assault," Berthod said. "I think that being able to organize the rape forum and bring 'Kristin's Story' to Bucknell has forced students to address these very important issues and realize that it is each and every single student's responsibility to create a safe environment."

Cooper described several signs that can be used to help identify someone who may be contemplating suicide, such as decreased energy or fatigue, a sleeping or eating problem, a feeling of guilt and excessive crying. She also encourages victims to seek counseling.

Suicide is the second leading killer of college students, the first being car accidents.

"If someone is depressed and suddenly becomes happy could mean that they know there is going to be an end to their pain. It's not that they want to die, it's that they can't live with the pain," Cooper said.

It was not until after Kristin committed suicide at her family's home that Cooper discovered Kristin's rape and the effects it had on her daughter's life.

"The police found evidence of rape in Kristin's journal, but throughout all the pages she had written, she never mentioned his name," Cooper said.

"I think that being able to organize the rape forum and bring 'Kristin's Story' to Bucknell, have forced students to address these very important issues and realize that it is each and every single students responsibility to create a safe environment."
—Samantha Berthod '04

The family later found that Kristin's probable attacker was a friend who had raped Kristin after a party at his apartment. Cooper now spends her time researching and spreading information about the dangers of acquaintance rape and the severe psychological damage that the victim can suffer.

"I am sharing this because I hope by telling Kristin's story that other lives will be saved, and other young women will not be victims of acquaintance rape," Cooper said.

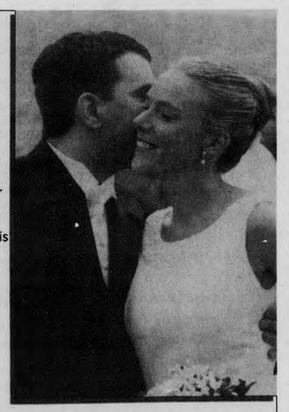
Cooper's moving presentation captured the audience's attention and was well-received.

"Andrea Cooper is a wonderful woman, always filled with energy. Her strength in being able to share her painful story to benefit others is inspirational," Berthod said.

Both sororities hope that Cooper's 'Kristin's Story' will serve as an example of how cosponsorship within the Panhellenic Council can benefit the University community.

"Andrea's admiration for sororities and the good they can do, especially when they combine their efforts, has encouraged us to try and plan more projects together. Without the planning and hard work of both sororities, 'Kristin's Story' would not have been such a success," Gabler said. "I believe we have not only improved the executive bonds between our sororities, but also the bonds of friendship. 'Kristin's Story' was a great experience for our sororities and I hope it will encourage other Greek organizations to try the same."

No sultry, "I love you." No "I'm the luckiest man" routine. Just the truth. "This photographer is amazing!" 'Nuff Said.



They'll have the rest of thier lives for romance, right now they need a photographer.

University responds to Operation Iraqi Freedom

Since the commencement of Operation Iraqi Freedom, our inboxes have been flooded with e-mails from University students, staff and administrators, attempting to inform the campus community of the abundance of resources available to assist in understanding and coping with the war. These resources include educational and cultural videos and seminars, a number of support groups and group discussions.

These e-mails are being sent for a reason. It is our responsibility not only to read those e-mails, but also to take advantage of these opportunities to grow in our knowledge and understanding of our nation and our community.

We must encourage that everyone acts on the initiatives put forth in an earlier e-mail from Stephen Bowen, provost and vice president for academic affairs. Professors should take time in classes to facilitate discussions about the war. Deviate from the syllabuses to address these issues. Apply lectures and current events to class material. Encourage healthy debate and discussion.

Class discussions should not be limited to classes like "U.S. National Security Policy" or "U.S. and the Middle East." The war can and should be a topic of discussion in classes ranging from English and literature to the sciences—even physics.

Students want to take class time to discuss the situation in Iraq and students want to hear the viewpoints and opinions of their professors.

Professors and administrators also need to be more understanding than usual for unexcused absences and tardiness. The war will affect every member of the campus community in one way or another. Many will be directly affected, as almost every student knows someone in the combat zone. And for those who do not have a friend or loved one in the service, they may still be affected by the very fact that this is truly a historic event.

Like Sept. 11, 2001, the next few months will be some of the most important and remembered for years to come.

While the University offered many services to students to help deal with Sept. 11, it may be imperative to rethink some actions.

During the crisis of Sept. 11, it was emphasized that the University community must move on, as any disruption to its routine would only hurt people and would gratify the terrorists' intentions.

While this may be true in the long run, there is no doubt that both students and faculty would have benefited from a day of reflection. Simply hearing the news of such a disaster is emotionally exhausting. Students did not want to spend their days in chemistry lab, they wanted watch the news and be in close contact with their families and friends.

Should events warrant in Iraq, students need to be given the opportunity to discuss the events with friends and families, make contact with loved ones in Iraq, following the stories through live news broadcasts, participating in vigils or simply reflecting on the events at hand.

Furthermore, students need to be able to reach their families as soon as possible. On Sept. 11, it was virtually impossible to make a phone call on campus. More outgoing lines should be made available in a central location for student use.

Additionally, students should not be receiving any potentially distressing news alone. Like the services provided on Sept. 11, Psychological Services should establish a more central location where students will feel more comfortable going to speak to a counselor. Many students may feel embarrassed to go to Lowry House for assistance, but a more informal location would be welcomed by students.

We have confidence in the University to handle the current situation and any potential crisis which may occur, and look forward to a quick yet minimally destructive resolution to the war in Iraq.

Finally and most importantly, the Editorial Board of The Bucknellian sends our best wishes to the coalition forces who are in the Middle East.

Assault statistics alarming

Results from campus student survey

To the Editor:

We applaud the attention paid recently by The Bucknellian to the issue of sexual assault and associated problems on the University campus. With a group of students, we conducted a survey in the spring of 2001 on unwanted sexual behavior at the University and reported the results in various public forums in the fall of 2002. The sample for this study consisted of 178 randomly selected students (107 women, 71 men).

The results indicated that 36 percent of the women and 18 percent of the men experienced unwanted fondling; 31 percent of these women and 8 percent of these men considered these incidents to be assaults; 54 percent of these women and 46 percent of these men reported one or more symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder related to these incidents; and 5 percent of these women and none of these men reported these incidents to campus authorities.

Twenty-four percent of the women and 7 percent of the men reported instances of unwanted sex (anal, oral or vaginal intercourse); 16 percent of these women and none of these men considered these incidents to be assaults; 68 percent of these women and 20 percent of these men reported one or more symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder related to these incidents; and in no cases were these incidents reported to campus authorities.

Unwanted fondling occurred most often on the dance floor or at a party; unwanted sex occurred most often in the context of a hookup. Students within the Greek system were more likely than non-Greeks to experience unwanted sex, and the frequency of hooking up and consuming alcohol were both positively associated with the likelihood of experiencing unwanted sex.

Since we find these results alarming, we continue to conduct research on these and related topics with our students, and we encourage strongly a continued dialogue about these issues among all constituencies on campus.

Sincerely,

William F. Flack Jr., Ph.D.,
Assistant Professor of Psychology

Kimberly Daubman, Ph.D.

Natatorium is first-class

To the Editor:

As swimming parents who attend many championship swim meets, we just wanted to congratulate the school on the wins of both the men's and women's swim teams in the recent Patriot League Championships and to compliment those coaches, officials and staff members who ran the meet so beautifully. All of the details that make a meet run smoothly don't just happen. It takes hours of planning and lots of hard work.

Additionally, we can't say enough about what a fine facility the aquatics center is. The construction of a beautiful, deep and fast pool is just the beginning of what it takes to make a natatorium great.

Ample deck space and spectator seating, good lighting, a superb sound system and a fantastic scoreboard are just a few of the features that make Bucknell's natatorium first-class.

These features shouldn't be taken for granted just because a facility is new. We have just returned from another championship meet for our other children in another state's premier, new facility that is lacking many of the features the Kinney Natatorium possesses.

All weekend long we said to ourselves, "Bucknell's is better!" The entire University community should indeed take pride in what has been accomplished in the completion of this terrific pool as well as in the swimming and diving performances of its fine athletes.

All of the details that make a meet run smoothly don't just happen. It takes hours of planning and lots of hard work.

Sincerely,

Susan and Bob Steadman

A prayer for the Middle East

A historic opportunity to advance the stability of the region

Despite the reservations many have about the timing and motivations of our war with Iraq, Americans are rightfully united in hope that the outcome of this conflict will be as positive and swift as possible. The foremost concern in my mind is the safety and health of the men and women of the American armed forces. This country has a proud tradition of uniting behind our troops despite our feelings about the broader conflict, and I hope that we continue that tradition. We have an all-volunteer army of soldiers who are willing to sacrifice themselves to protect our country and the freedoms we cherish so dearly.

I believe that the vast majority of citizens also wish for the fewest civilian casualties among the people of Iraq. While we are at war with Iraq's government and its leaders, we are rightfully making a distinction between the people of Iraq and its leadership. America's enormous technological superiority allows us to pinpoint our munitions better than at any time in history and we should continue to utilize our capabilities to spare the Iraqi people from unnecessary death and injury.

One of the secondary effects of the war with Iraq may be increased instability in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The international focus on Iraq should not be taken advantage of by either side to escalate violent activities.

This war will be covered by the media differently than during wars in the past, which can probably already be observed by most viewers. The decreased military oversight of reporters and the immediacy with which reports from the battlefront will be beamed into our lounges and living rooms is a positive step in the progression of reporting. I do, however, hope that all journalists covering the war recognize the increased responsibility to omit tactical information that comes with their increased freedom to report.

MIDDLE EAST

One of the secondary effects of the war with Iraq may be increased instability in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The international focus on Iraq should not be taken advantage of by either Israel or Palestine to escalate violent activities. Recent history has unfortunately demonstrated that during international crisis and conflict, violence has increased in this region when the world's attention was focused elsewhere.

Furthermore, any attempt by Iraq to draw Israel into this war should be condemned and resisted by the world community. Iraq may very well hope to provoke Israel into entering the war in an effort to transform the current war into a conflict that pits the United States and Israel against the Arab world. This war is not a clash of cultures or religions and should not deteriorate into one.

The outline of a permanent solution already exists; what is missing is the will and courage of leaders to make the peace a reality. The president's roadmap is a needed start towards re-establishing a dialogue.

A recent promising development in this region is the establishment and confirmation of Mahmoud Abbas as prime minister of Palestine. Even before the opening of hostilities in this war, Abbas has been presented with a historical opportunity to achieve progress in a conflict that is in desperate need of a new direction and new leadership. Now, Abbas has a greater challenge and a greater opportunity to lead the Palestinian people in a peaceful and responsible direction. There is great hope that Abbas will continue to be a force for pragmatic thinking within the Palestinian government.

Abbas has shown in the recent past that he believes the current cycle of violence is not producing progress for the Palestinian people. He was a crucial member of the Palestinian delegation during the Oslo negotiations and has shown a willingness to deal directly with Israeli leaders. Abbas' appointment is a promising sign for increased democracy in the Palestinian territories.

Despite the uncertainty is the coming days and weeks, Israel and the Palestinians should make good faith efforts to reduce the animosity and violence that is scarring their land. One of the easiest and most effective way accomplish this goal is through increased cultural exchanges. Just like how the American people are not at war with the Iraqi people, the Israeli and Palestinian people have no reason to be at war with each other.

Many times history has demonstrated that when two governments are unable or unwilling to work out their differences and treat each other with respect and dignity, the people those governments purport find it surprisingly easy to treat each other with the necessary deference. Cultural exchanges and combined activities, such as rallies against violence, are integral to allowing the people of each side to recognize and appreciate the humanity of the people of the other side.

Groups such as the Forum of Bereaved Parents are able to accomplish these goals. The forum is a group of Israeli and Palestinian parents who have lost children to the violence in the ongoing conflict. Instead of succumbing to feelings of revenge and anger, these parents recognize that the only solution that ensures the safety of all the people in the region is a cooperation between the two peoples working toward a peaceful solution.

The outline of a permanent solution already exists; what is missing is the will and courage of leaders to make the peace a reality. The president's roadmap is a needed start towards re-establishing a dialogue. There appears to be nearly a consensus on both sides that the pre-1967 boarders are a fair geographical compromise. The remaining, unresolved issues deal with the sovereignty over Jerusalem and the right of return of Palestinian refugees. Moderates on both sides seem to be making progress on these highly emotional issues. This is where the most courage, creativity and leadership are needed.

The outcome of all these actions and progress can be a significantly more stable Middle East. Once Iraq is defeated, the United States should work with the international community to rebuild the country's infrastructure and to introduce democratic institutions. A peaceful and democratic Iraq can serve as an example to the rest of the region. Progress in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict should lead to a sovereign, economically viable and non-threatening Palestinian state. This in turn will help Israel to re-establish its security. A bright future for all three of these peoples will do wonders for the safety and security of the region and the world as a whole.

What is the future of the United Nations?

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

The bombs have begun dropping and the troops are moving in. Baghdad has become the final battleground for Iraqi President Saddam Hussein to let go of his lingering grasp of a dying dictatorship. Operation Iraqi Freedom has begun. So now what is up for the United Nations?

Many were upset by the inability to reach a U.N. Security Council agreement on Iraq, upset that America was incapable of properly integrating the Franco-German position. This would have been totally inadvisable. In short, the Franco-German approach has and will continue to wreak considerable damage to both of their nations and the United Nations in particular; the latter now showing signs of an ominous future, if history serves as any indication.

For wisdom and inspiration I often go to the 7th Street Café—partly because they make great shakes, and partly because it's a good place to hear the latest opinions from our campus' leading leftists. Monday night, this particular coffee shop clientele was seriously disheartened.

While most leftists seem at least understanding of the possible favorable outcomes of Iraq's liberation, they still fear the consequences of America's so-called unilateralist approach. One woman said that what the United States had done with the United Nations—by moving ahead sans yet another resolution—was "reprehensible." Another student theorized that America would cease to exist in 50 years if it continued down our current foreign policy path unabated; he said our end would come from within. These seem to be popular concerns among the left.

Allow me to explain why not only is this of no concern, but rather why it's understandable, necessary and beneficial for the United Nations itself.

Many allege that acquiring the United Nation's approval is a necessary prerequisite for any U.S.-led action, some even extending this to say it would be against international law. France should tell these critics that this is not the case, as it saw little reason to seek U.N. approval for its military adventures in the Ivory Coast last year—or, former U.S. President Bill Clinton, who did not feel it to be a problem to intervene in Kosovo minus a U.N. mandate. Other examples of this variety abound innumerably.

Critics also allege such action was unpopular in the U.N. Security Council outside the U.S.-U.K. alliance, although Britain's Foreign Minister let it be known that another resolution would have passed if France's threatened veto was not looming over the proceedings.

France instead sought ever more inspections. This wasn't the first time the country has chosen such a fatalistic tact in foreign affairs. Recall post-World War I, when the war's victors were set to disarm Germany through international inspectors: Unlike Iraq, many weapons were destroyed; like Iraq, a clandestine weapons program was immediately implemented. The inspectors were being intimidated, their missions made near impossible. Rather than resort back to military occupation, France sought more inspections.

And now, once again, France has proudly marched into the cowardly factions of history.

The German field marshal, left in charge of the German armies, said in agreement to comments claiming it would take a long time to become war ready, "Months would be necessary to prepare a new war, and do you think the French would look by with their hands in their pockets?" Well, the French did, and soon Adolf Hitler assumed power. Ten years later France was playing host to the German army.

And now, once again, France has proudly marched into the cowardly factions of history.

Much like the League of Nation's inspectors were unable to stop World War II, which is why the international organization subsequently failed. The United Nations is now seemingly headed towards a similar fate. To my coffee shop friend: It's not America that's unable to subsist in its current form for another 50 years—it's the United Nations, though the timetable is probably even smaller.

The United Nations is somewhat laughable when considered in a historical context. France, Britain and Russia—all of which are veto-yielding members of the Security Council—are hardly major international players.

The largest failure of the organization is its inability to adapt to global changes. Russia is now a Third World country. France is also an economic basket case. Japan, Germany and India are all more influential in terms of their economies, populations and geopolitical power, yet they have no permanent spots on the U.N. Security Council.

Russia is now a Third World country. France is also an economic basket case. Japan, Germany and India are all more influential in terms of their economies, populations and geopolitical power, yet they have no permanent spots on the council.

In terms of global regional representation, Latin America and Africa have no veto-possessing seats, while Europe has three. One also inherently assumes that all of these countries are equal in that they are all sovereign, good-willed, self-determining nations, but this is hardly the case.

Many are merely representatives of brutal dictatorships, not representative democracies. Most act in self-interest rather than out of concern for international peace and security. Almost all carry their own biases. The United Nations, by all accounts, is hardly an international judge, an objective arbitrator or anything else to that effect. The United States failing to convince the United Nations to enforce its own resolutions should hardly be a shocking occurrence.

With this latest episode—Hussein—the United Nations is still unable to garner the strength to enforce its own intended peace producing resolutions.

While it is already clear that the form and function of the organization needs reform, let us take a brief look at its record regardless.

Daniel Moynihan was one of the first to note the United Nation's inability to tackle real issues, when—after culminating his term as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations—he called it a "theater for the absurd" after it had voted to declare Zionism racism.

During the entirety of the Hussein-led Iran/Iraq war that consumed much of the 1980s, the United Nations simply hoped for the best.

"The former U.N. secretary-general Boutros Boutros-Ghali has had the courage to admit that it was guilty of criminal negligence when it did not act to stop the genocide in Rwanda (two million dead) or in the former Yugoslavia (half a million dead)," Iranian author Amir Taheri wrote.

Taheri also observed that the United Nations failed to prevent the Anglo-French invasion of Egypt in 1956, the French wars in Indochina, the Vietnam war, the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, the India-China war of 1961, the four Arab-Israeli wars, the many India-Pakistan wars and, of course, many, many more.

Joshua Muravchik, author of "Heaven on Earth: The Rise and Fall of Socialism," observed in The Wall Street Journal that when war broke out in Bosnia, and a quarter million lives were slaughtered, rather than come to the rescue, the United Nations passed an arms embargo that tied the hands of victims while assisting their aggressors.

"The U.N.'s most recent dereliction of life-and-death duty resulted in Europe's worst massacre since 1945, the 1995 slaughter of 8,000 Bosnian Muslims at Srebrenica, where they had gather because the U.N. assured them it was a 'safe area,'" George Will wrote. "The massacre occurred while U.N. force loitered a few miles away."

With this latest episode—involving Hussein—the United Nations is still unable to garner the strength to enforce its own intended peace-producing resolutions. Instead, the United States must pick up where the United Nations leaves off.

As George Will noted, the U.N. policy is one of "inexhaustible tolerance." America's is not. To subordinate the might of the American military to the "theater of the absurd" is, in fact, an absurd notion in itself. To allow America to fulfill its role as a force of peace, justice and freedom is hardly "reprehensible."

University actions lack consistency and logic

By Aaron Hanlon
Senior Writer

Just as it was with Little League umpires, we can all tolerate and forgive erroneous judgment calls from authoritative bodies so long as they demonstrate some semblance of fairness and consistency. Otherwise, blatant hypocrisy stacked on what was already a bad move makes for a most calamitous outcome, such as in our current situation: A tenacious mother is spreading propaganda throughout the University community, including lengthy letters to parents. Students are squirming with insecurities over whether or not they can feel protected from sexual assault or a false accusation of sexual assault. Credibility is being questioned all over the place. At least one student has been forced to tolerate the pain of this commotion on top of post-traumatic stress. And to make matters much, much worse, the University has failed to make a statement to the campus community regarding Christina Abdulghani's inappropriate response to the Board of Trustees' decision to expel her son, Tareq Abdulghani.

Not long ago, the student publication, The Counterweight, incited University administrators into a frenzy. Once the issue took flight with national media and drew complaints from many alumni (many of whom were perennial donors), the University released a barrage of defenses and clarifications. Dean of Students Richard Ferraro sent out a campuswide e-mail, and Associate Director of Public Relations Alan Janesch sent out many e-mails, press releases and official University statements. The campus community, along with the rest of the world, was informed of the University's position on Counterweight-related matters.

Fast forward to now-another campuswide controversy has sparked similar discussion, confusion and consequential emotional reactions within the University community. When I asked several University administrators where the big University statement was in light of all the faulty information that has been dissipated over this past month, I received the same seemingly plausible answer over and over again: "We are waiting for the appeals procedures to end," waiting for the figurative green light to speed through the intersection of Litigation and Liability. On the surface this seems an entirely legitimate excuse. After considering the details of past University crisis management actions, the fear-of-crossing-the-law excuse is incredible.

In spite of what it has consistently maintained as a direct threat of litigation against the University by the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education for the University's libelous statements against The Counterweight and its staff, the University has continued to publicly stand by said libelous statements in spite of the attached legal ramifications. Clearly, the University is not afraid of being sued for issuing statements that could potentially justify litigation. While I am not suggesting that there should have been a libelous or misleading statement issued similar to that which was issued after the Counterweight controversy, I strongly believe that the University, whose regulations and procedures have called for the expulsion of Abdulghani, should have issued a statement in support of its actions long ago.

The absence of such an explicit statement paints a vivid picture of the University's current state of mixed-up priorities. When a student publication pointedly criticized specific University policies and administrators in the limelight of national media coverage, the deans and the public relations department scrambled for a position and publicly stuck by it while the threat of litigation lingered. Now, a student has been sexually assaulted and subsequently libeled on a Web site and slandered by ignorant students on a daily basis. Still, the University has made no statement to fortify its actions, hiding behind a supposed fear of giving ammunition to Ms. Abdulghani's case. In so doing, it has failed to help protect thousands of its students who are in many cases unaware of the facts. With The Counterweight, the University impulsively involved itself when it was certainly not needed. Now, it has taken a seemingly nonchalant and laissez-faire approach in perhaps one of the only instances in which students would benefit from the authoritative University standing up for its position against a noticeably well-financed propaganda machine. The University should have already issued (but must now issue) a statement to the campus community in support of its actions with the same urgency with which it issued past statements about The Counterweight, but with a new and improved regard for factual information. Though it may seem a bit much for me to demand the best of both worlds, we should be aware of the fact that our current situation is much more severe than previous ones involving words on pages. Here, it seems as though a true crime has been committed. The University's actions in ridding our campus of certain individuals indicate a commitment to campus safety; but in this commitment it should never waver, never give in and never, ever equivocate.

Our presumptuous post-war plans

By Mike Niebauer
Senior Writer

U.S. President George W. Bush is putting forward the view that the successful freeing of Iraq will be the catalyst for a safer and saner Middle East. Bush is making the sale for pre-emptive war while assuring a skeptical world that our intentions are not imperial but are simply to establish a democratic system in a post-Hussein Iraq. The Washington Post quoted Bush, who said, "A liberated Iraq can show the power of freedom to transform that vital region, by instilling hope and progress into the lives of millions....A new regime in Baghdad can serve as a dramatic and inspiring example of freedom for other nations in the region." The speech was very positive and harkens back to former U.S. President Woodrow Wilson's views of a post-World War I diplomatic world. The American political reality refused this view.

Bush used the forum of his speech at the American Enterprise Institute to paint a vision of American hopes and dreams for a Middle East that depends on few allowances for the realities and the everyday dynamics of the Middle East. Bush proposes a commitment to this mission that will last years and cost the American taxpayers billions in scarce resources that his administration has failed to adequately prepare the American people to bear. Bush said, "Rebuilding Iraq will require a sustained commitment from many nations, including our own. We will remain in Iraq as long as necessary, and no more."

This would mean cooperation from other nations that we are now not in agreement with on the Iraq issue. The opposition of Germany and France cannot be replaced by the political or financial assistance from countries like Romania and Bulgaria. Any democratizing of Iraq will take decades and we will need the aid of the United Nations regardless of how much the United States questions its relevance in the 21st century. Without a proper second U.N. sanction the United States would probably bear the entire financial cost of the occupation of Iraq.

Bush's extended his vision on the Middle East to the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. Bush prescribes a post-Hussein Iraq as a cure-all for the long-standing conflict in the occupied Palestinian territories. In a Washington Post article Bush said, "Without this outside support for terrorism (referring to Hussein's support for suicide bombers) Palestinians working for reform and long for democracy will be in a better position." The same day Bush called for Israel to end its settlement activity in the occupied territories Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon formed a hard-line government that favors expanded settlements and is openly hostile to timetables for peace or any currently discussed peace accords.

Lopes de Silva the United Nation's top humanitarian official in Iraq warns that 10 million people could run out of food within six weeks of a U.S.-led attack if they did not receive emergency aid. Da Silva said in a Washington Post article, "They need to be sending ships of wheat to the Persian Gulf along with ships of soldiers." The Iraqi government's efforts to get a six-month cushion of food reserves in case of warfare have failed. Six weeks is closer to reality. "After that, we will have to feed 10 million people....Eventually we will have to feed the entire population." Another U.N. official said, "It will be an enormous-if not-impossible task. There is no precedent for an aid operation of this scale." To paraphrase Lopes da Silva, the warehouses that store food under the Iraqi food program are now empty so there are no stockpiles from which U.S. soldiers can draw food.

The Washington Post reported, "The Bush administration has said it expects Iraq to manage for several weeks on existing food supplies and emergency rations provided by the United States and intergovernmental organizations. Planners in Washington anticipate that large segments of Iraq will be stable within days of a U.S.-led attack permitting food aid and relief efforts even as fighting continues in Baghdad and elsewhere."

Hopefully, it is now becoming clear that the rosy scenario that the president is painting for a post-Hussein Middle East is going to be economically expensive and politically messy for the United States. The president's predictions and prescriptions may come true but will the American people make the crucial bet of steady support that all his predictions will be correct and follow the course toward his vision?

First-year social success is elusive

By Jordy Leiser

Is it just me, or is there a serious lack of opportunities for freshman dudes to enjoy a "successful" first year of college?

In "Swingers," Vince Vaughn says, "There's nothing wrong with letting the girls know that you're money, and that you're ready to party."

How money am I? I'm a freshman dude at Bucknell. I have no car, no television (oh yeah, like I'm really going to spend a night with a girl watching television in my freshman dorm lounge), nothing but 8,000 unused meal credits, and no cool places to which I can escort the woman of my dreams. My claustrophobic universe is limited to the 5,000 square foot block that is Lewisburg, Pa.

How ready am I to party? I'm a freshman dude at Bucknell. I'm not allowed to join a frat as a freshman. I have no access to people who throw parties, people who stand at the door of parties, people who buy required "beverages" for parties, social parties, dance parties, upperclassmen or "action" of any kind.

So let's get this straight. The following is what the administration would suggest me (a freshman dude) to do to take out a "beautiful baby who's ready to party." Start with a lovely dinner at the Bostwick Cafeteria, including green Jell-O for dessert, a stop at the 7th Street Café for an Irish Cream Dream, then off to an embarrassing display of awkwardness and shame at the late-night karaoke, and end with a few relaxing moments in front of the television, which gets no channels? Wow! Fantastic.

I'm from Colorado, and all things considered, I haven't spent much time on the East Coast. Would it kill the administration to let me bring a car so I can maybe, just once, see the Capitol Building or go to Yankee Stadium? Don't tell me that the University's weekend trips to "big cities" help at all. How many college kids do you know who are awake on a Saturday morning at 6:30 a.m. that are not completely still bombed from the night before? Exactly.

Start with a lovely dinner at the Bostwick Cafeteria, including green Jell-O for dessert, a stop at the 7th Street Café for an Irish Cream Dream, then off to an embarrassing display of awkwardness and shame at the late-night karaoke, and end with a few relaxing moments in front of the television, which gets no channels?

My political science class requires that I focus my attention on current events. I'm not saying I'd watch C-SPAN all day, but I'd definitely know what the hell is going on in the world if I had a television in my room. If an earthquake took out all of Southern California, I probably would not hear about it until my usual Sunday night phone call with my mom. Would it kill the school to put in, at the least, an option for television in dorm rooms? Holy cow! I'd go so far as to give up beer for a year to get SportsCenter in the confines of my filthy dorm room (eh, maybe not that far). Even my professors went crazy when they found out I missed that Duke/Maryland game the other night!

OK, I understand the reason for not allowing freshman to rush, but there has to be some way to make it easier for freshman to get into parties, on and off campus. Institute a freshman quota system or something. "This party will not start until I have at least 10 freshman guys up here dancing with the 10 hottest senior chicks at Bucknell." Now that's policy!

I somehow have managed to weasel my way into a frat party here, a house party there, as well as mooch a couple rides to the city. I consider myself lucky to have accomplished such feats, and to my colleagues, I hope you have found similar success this year ... Godspeed!

War on terror, al-Qaida progresses

Capture of al-Qaida member Yassir al-Jaziri seen as victory in war on terror

Courtesy of Reuters

U.S. soldiers stationed in Bagram, Afghanistan are part of coalition forces that continue to pursue al-Qaida and Taliban operatives. Resulting from ongoing coalition efforts, a second al-Qaida operative known to be close to Osama bin Laden has been apprehended.

By Lindsey Gentel
Staff Writer

An al-Qaida suspect, who is allegedly in charge of communications for Osama bin Laden's terrorist network, was captured during a recent raid in Lahore, Pakistan. Yassir al-Jaziri was arrested on March 15, along with a man believed to be his brother-in-law. According to The Washington Post, both men have started cooperating and "giving some leads" to interrogators from Pakistan and the United States.

With this information, Bush administration officials and U.S. intelligence experts have announced that the United States is within reach of breaking up the leadership of al-Qaida.

CIA and FBI officials said the arrest and information provided under the interrogation of al-Qaida lieutenant Khalid Sheik Mohammed this month have given them concrete reasons to believe the United States will soon bring about the collapse of al-Qaida and the capture of Osama bin Laden, MSNBC reported.

With additional cooperation from al-Jaziri, the dismantling of the leadership within the al-Qaida terrorist network looks probable.

"I believe the tide has turned in-terms of al-Qaida," said Rep. Porter J. Goss, R-Fla., chairman of the House Intelligence Committee and a former CIA case officer, according to The Washington Post. "We're at the top of the hill. For the first time, they have more to fear from us than we have to fear from them."

According to The Washington Post, a dozen other counterterrorism intelligence experts and law-enforcement officials reiterated this attitude.

The capture of these men has also increased optimism because the United States now possesses improved knowledge of certain targets, allowing for heightened security.

With a number of high-ranking al-Qaida members imprisoned and undergoing CIA interrogations, the information "can be bounced off five other senior guys now anxious to tell us what they know," said an intelligence expert, according to The Washington Post. Because the CIA and FBI are more familiar than they were a year ago with the organization and individuals involved in al-Qaida, they are better able to put the new leads to use.

Another intelligence expert told The Washington Post that the CIA and FBI "believe they are on a roll and can get this group of people whom we know were involved in 9/11. We've got them nailed, and we're close to dismantling them."

The recent successes have convinced many U.S. officials that al-Qaida would have difficulty executing another attack like those of 2001. While they do not rule out that possibility, many officials said smaller-scale bombings are more likely.

"If they don't pull off another big operation soon, some of their financial backers are going to ask whether it makes sense to give them a lot more money soon," one intelligence official who tracks terrorist operations said to The Washington Post. "Their viability is going to be questioned around the world. They are probably under pressure to show they are still viable."

The recent success for the United States with the war on terrorism is leaving the CIA optimistic on the dismantling of al-Qaida.

CIA Director George J. Tenet told The Washington Post, in regards to these recent arrests of Mohammed and al-Jaziri, "It's a very, very big deal."

Senate bill bans partial-birth abortions

By David LaRoss
Staff Writer

After a long and impassioned debate in Washington and throughout the United States, the U.S. Senate's 64-33 vote to ban partial-birth abortions was overwhelming. The vote was taken on March 13 after a three-day Senate debate that saw the bill's supporters win all but one of the preliminary votes. The statement in the text of the bill supporting the landmark Roe v. Wade case, as a result of the one, nonbinding vote they lost, will likely be stripped from the bill before it goes to the president.

If the bill passes the Republican-controlled House (all indications are that it will) this spring, it will be the third such bill to reach the president in the past 10 years. The two previous bills were passed under former President Bill Clinton, who summarily vetoed both of them. President George W. Bush is a strong supporter of the ban.

"Partial-birth abortion is an abhorrent procedure that offends human dignity, and I commend the Senate for passing legislation to ban it," Bush said to CNN after the bill was passed.

Partial-birth, or intact dilation and extraction, refers to a late-term abortion technique in which labor is artificially induced until the lower body of the fetus emerges. The head is then collapsed, and the dead but intact fetus is delivered. Last year, roughly 2,200 partial-birth abortions, less than 1 percent of the total number of abortions, were performed, according to The New York Times.

The debate over partial-birth abortion has been the focus of abortion rights conflicts for almost eight years, since it first came into the spotlight in 1995. The 31 statewide bans on the procedure are proof of the success of antiabortion activists on this issue.

Even if the ban is signed into law, there will be one more challenge for its supporters before they can claim victory. A similar law passed by the Nebraska state legislature was struck down by the Supreme Court in 2000 as unconstitutional under Roe v. Wade on the grounds that it did not provide a clear distinction between partial-birth abortions and other methods and that it contained no provision for situations where the mother's health was threatened.

The new bill gives a specific definition of what constitutes a partial-birth abortion, although the only mention of health concerns is a statement that the procedure is "never necessary" for the health of the mother, making exemptions only in life-threatening cases. The bill's main sponsor, Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., said that the provisions were "standard boiler-plate language" of "no consequence," according to CNN.

Abortion-rights groups have promised a reprise of the 2000 case.

"Planned Parenthood will file suit as soon as the bill is signed," said Gloria Feldt, president of the group, to The New York Times. "I mean that minute."

Since the 2000 decision was 5-4, supporters of the ban are hoping that at least one justice will have retired, and the newly appointed justice will tip the balance to their side before the case comes to the Supreme Court.

Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., voiced one common fear of the bill's opponents. "I understand what the other side wants to do. They are hoping to get somebody new on the Supreme Court and to turn the clock back completely, to overrule Roe v. Wade," she said to the Associated Press.

There is definitely a movement to limit, if not reverse, the effects of Roe v. Wade. According to The New York Times, Santorum compared it to the Dred Scott decision that categorized escaped slaves as property in the early 19th century. "It took from the people the right to decide their own fate, and rested it in an unelected body, at that time, of nine old men," Santorum said.

Unrest contributes to rising oil prices

Gasoline prices, over $2 per gallon in some places, could threaten U.S. economy

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

Americans love their SUVs and other large cars that have terrible gas mileage and make for a menace on the roads. With the prospective war in Iraq, gas prices have spiked over recent weeks to reflect the uncertainty that grips the world markets. Because a vast majority of the world's reserves of oil sits underneath the Persian Gulf region, many worry that the war could disrupt supplies.

As a result, gas and oil prices are spiking to record levels, causing many Americans to rethink their driving habits. Road travel is down and businesses like trucking companies are feeling the squeeze.

Oil supplies in America are at a level lower than necessary to maintain a seamless supply of oil for the American people and businesses. MSNBC.com cites the lower level of oil inventories, near their lowest level since 1975, as a danger to gas supplies in the coming summer, when more Americans tend to travel. According to MSNBC.com, the second quarter is when companies typically replenish supplies that were drained following the winter months.

A research note from J.P. Morgan said, "The U.S. needs large slugs of extra oil to cope with the increase in (refinery) runs, stop the erosion of inventories and to begin to claw back some cover. The U.S. oil market is undersupplied. The main problem is that while global oil demand does indeed hit a minimum (in the second quarter), U.S. crude oil runs increase."

> "Energy experts say they expect prices to continue higher as spring weather tempts drivers back onto the roads and boosts demand during a time of war—a situation that could threaten a U.S. economic recovery by cutting discretionary spending."
> —MSNBC.com

All this is causing havoc at the gas pumps, where Americans are paying higher prices than they have in the recent past. According to The New York Times, the Department of Energy's weekly price checks found that the cost for a gallon of regular gasoline averaged from about $1.61 in the Gulf Coast region to as high as $2.15 in California, a jump by as much as 6 cents per gallon in the past week. Until now, the highest average price paid was in May 2001 when prices were at an average of $1.71 across the country.

"The EIA noted that the current prices, if inflation were taken into account, might still be considered a bargain compared to what motorists paid in 1981. Using today's dollars, gasoline cost an equivalent of $2.90 a gallon in March 1981 in the aftermath of the turmoil in oil supply caused by Iran's 1979 Islamic revolution," The New York Times reported.

The Automobile Association of America reported this week that gasoline prices are running about 50 cents per gallon higher this year than they were a year ago, according to MSNBC.com.

"Energy experts say they expect prices to continue higher as spring weather tempts drivers back onto the roads and boosts demand during a time of war—a situation that could threaten a U.S. economic recovery by cutting discretionary spending," MSNBC reported.

At the same time, Saudi Arabia, the nation with the largest reserve of oil, is working to create a stockpile of oil it can release into the market should Iraqi or Kuwaiti production be affected in the war.

According to The New York Times, Saudi Arabia has built up a 50 million barrel reserve over the past several months that it can tap immediately if problems arise. Crude oil prices recently traded in the $34 to $36 per barrel range.

"Saudi Arabia is producing about 9 million barrels a day, [a representative of the Saudi oil ministry] said, or about 1.5 million more than its OPEC [Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries] quota. The Saudis have about 1.5 million barrels of additional production capacity that they can bring on in less than several weeks, if the need arises, he said. Independent experts have estimated that Saudi Arabia is producing 9.2 million to 9.5 million barrels a day, with an additional one million barrels that can be called upon," The New York Times reported.

All this will create a situation where prices may remain high for the coming weeks as the war in Iraq is pursued. OPEC nations are prepared to continue the supply needed by the world market to make sure oil supplies remain constant. Many hope that a win in Iraq will drive prices down, but they know that any drop in prices is still well off in the distance. American gas prices will not fall until oil falls, something that may put a crimp on the summer travel season.

Men's Lacrosse falls to Maryland

Bison fall to the .500 mark after a disappointing 14-8 loss to third-ranked Maryland

By Pat Evans
Sports Editor

The Bison men's lacrosse team gave third-ranked Maryland all it could handle but ended up losing the game in the fourth quarter 14-8.

The team had a two game-winning streak going into the contest, picking up two 10-2 wins against Harvard and Butler. The Bison are now 2-2 overall and have yet to play a league game.

Maryland and the Bison played to a 6-6 tie after the first quarter and the Terps took the lead 9-7 going into the final quarter. From then on it was all Maryland as the Bison were unable to handle the Terps' pressure defense.

"The key was that we didn't have enough depth," Head Coach Sid Jamieson said. "We played well for a long time, but eventually it wears on you when you don't have many guys to fill in. Maryland's game plan was to work us hard when we were on offense so that we would eventually tire, and they were able to do that."

Dennis Geraghty '03 scored three goals for the Bison, while Rob Lane '03 and Andrew Copelan '03 each tallied two to help in the losing effort.

> "Our guys went right at this team," he said. "They weren't intimidated at all, and that's what you have to do. That winning attitude is the function of the guys in our program right now."
> —Sid Jamieson, head coach*

"We were a little gassed," Copelan said. "They're a good team, but this loss isn't something we're going to let get to us, we're going to put it behind us and move on."

The Bison missed a few opportunities to score at critical points in the game. In the late third quarter and early fourth quarter they had two chances to shoot on an empty net after they stole the goalie's clearing pass but were unable to capitalize.

"Those are the plays that really make a difference in games like these, and we didn't do that," Jamieson said.

Maryland is a scholarship program that will surely be competing for a national title this season, but the Bison have never been ones to back down from such a challenge. Despite the final score, Jamieson was happy with how his team responded.

"Our guys went right at this team," Jamieson said. "They weren't intimidated at all, and that's what you have to do. That winning attitude is the function of the guys in our program right now."

The Bison's resilient efforts were better rewarded against Harvard where they stifled all the Crimson's attempts and came away with a 10-2 victory. Justin Sussman '03 performed well in the game, saving 20 shots and helping his team secure the win despite being outshot 37-

Tennis sees much success over spring break

Women dominate the competition with a 7-0 preseason record; men struggle

By Pat Evans
Sports Editor

The women's tennis team has dominated all of its competition, and it is now 7-0 in its spring season after sweeping Delaware on March 16. The men continue to struggle, losing all but one of their matches over spring break, but they are focusing on the experience that their young team is gaining before playing Patriot League matches.

Nadezda Curcic '05 and Veronica Brown '06 started off the day against Delaware, winning the opening doubles 8-3. From there on out it was all Bison. The team did not lose a single doubles set all day.

Tanya Sichko '05 teamed up with Rheanna Gaskin '06 and Jill Wurzburg '03 joined Samantha Berthod '04 to finish off the clean sweep.

Singles play proved to be a bit more challenging but the Bison won all six spots to end the match with an overall 7-0 win.

"The mental attitude of the entire team is what is enabling them to be so successful," Head Coach Rebecca Helt said. "They take the court and refuse to lose, which is a mental frame of mind that I haven't seen here in awhile."

Earlier in the week the Bison knocked off St. Bonaventure 6-1, Niagra 4-3, Vassar 6-2, Indiana-Purdue-Fort Wayne 7-0 and Evansville 5-2. Part of the reason they have been able to dominate is because of the addition of Brown at the No. 2 singles spot and her contributions in the doubles games as well.

"Adding a strong freshman to the top of the lineup really helps us secure wins," Helt said.

The men lost three of the four matches they played over the break, dropping to Rhodes College 6-1, Norfolk State 7-0 and Penn State 7-0 and picking up a win against Indiana-Purdue-Fort Wayne 7-0.

"They've played some very strong teams this year and the schedule isn't going to get any easier for them," Helt said. "I do this on purpose to push them and to prepare them for the Patriot League games later in the season."

The Indiana-Purdue-Fort Wayne win showed that the Bison do have the potential to play at a very high level. The team dominated play, sweeping the competition. Nick Denefrio '05, Gerald DiChiara '05, Todd Jacobs '03, Asher Salam '06, Joe Menezes '05 and Aaron Saperstein '05 each picked up wins to contribute to the team's overall winning effort.

"The key for us is to just play more," Menezes said. "It's early in the season, we're young and we're improving and building every game."

Youth has been something that the men have realized would be an issue coming into this season. Jacobs is the Bison's sole upperclassman and is relied on to lead the inexperienced squad.

"They're playing very solid as a team right now," Helt said. "But they've got a young lineup and they're all playing in spots where they're really going to be challenged every match."

The women travel to take on Pittsburgh next Saturday at 11 a.m., and the men go to St. Bonaventure starting at 9 a.m.

Indoor track teams complete their seasons

Team looks forward to a successful outdoor season

By Evan Honeyfield
Staff Writer

The men's and women's indoor track teams completed their season at the IC4A and ECAC meets on March 8 and 9 in Boston.

Eric Furst '03 and Theresa Dennis '03 each captured a fourth-place finish to led their respective teams and earn All-East status.

After watching the first two heats of the 1,000-meter trials, Furst knew how fast he needed to run to qualify for finals. Taking charge early, he led his heat through 800 meters and then coasted home.

"I ran a very conservative trial, which placed me firmly into finals," Furst said. "I was comfortable the whole time."

The finals didn't go quite as well as expected, with a very slow opening 400 meters.

"That style race doesn't suit me too well," Furst said. "I tried to push for the finish at 100 meters to go, but got caught out on the turn and lost my momentum, smashing my hopes of the title. Being All-East isn't a terrible consolation prize."

Lou Palma '03 in the mile and Ryan Newberger '05 in the 200 also made the finals, but not as easily.

Similar to Furst, Palma was in the last heat of the mile and

Bucknell falls to Holy Cross in the P.L. Tournament

Bison overcame a 25-17 halftime deficit to defeat Lehigh in the first round of the tournament

By Dave Cohen
Senior Writer

A 52-47 win over Lehigh in the first round advanced the Bison to the semifinal of the Patriot League Tournament for the second straight year and for the tenth time in the 13-year history of the tournament. The Bison lost to the eventual champions of the tournament, Holy Cross, 75-50 in the semifinal game.

The fifth seeded Bison overcame a 25-17 halftime deficit against the Mountain Hawks and shot only 30 percent in the first half, but were able to come back to get the win. Kevin Bettencourt's '06 three point shooting combined with stingy defense headed by Dan Blankenship '03 who held Lehigh's leading scorer, Matt Logie, scoreless for the majority of the second half were the keys to the game.

Bettencourt sank three consecutive three pointers in the third quarter to cut the deficit to three at 36-33, and that's when the Bison began to take over the game.

The Orange and Blue rallied a 25-6 run over Lehigh capped off by Bettencourt's fifth three pointer of the day to make the score 49-40 in favor of the Bison.

Lehigh pulled to within three to make the score 50-47 with 18 seconds left, but the Bison were able to inbound the ball to Blankenship who hit two free throws to seal the deal.

Lalugba scored a game-high 21 points against Holy Cross in the semifinal game, but Holy Cross proved to be too much for the Bison, coming out to an early 15-5 lead and never trailing. The Crusaders went on to win 75-50 and were the eventual champions of the tournament.

The men's basketball team dropped its second consecutive game on March 2 to Colgate by the score of 64-56 in front of nearly 3,000 fans at Sojka Pavilion on Senior Day.

Andrew Zidar led the way for the Raiders with 15 points and 11 rebounds, including scoring nine straight points to propel his team to an early 13-1 advantage. Colgate also received 15 points from Mark Linebaugh and 10 from Howard Blue. Boakai Lalugba '03 said Zidar's play was significant in propelling the Raiders to a road

Bison track and field athletes conclude another superb season

Theresa Dennis '03 gears up to pass an opponent at Gerhard Fieldhouse. Dennis set a personal record and earned a fourth-place finish in the 5,000 with a time of 17:12. She hopes to continue her string of accomplishments during the quickly-approaching outdoor season in the 10,000 and 5,000.

knew what he needed. Squeezing into the finals, as the second to last qualifier, Palma ran a personal best of 4 minutes, 10 seconds. In the finals, Palma was with the pack through 1400m, before fading to 10th.

Head Coach Kevin Donner was impressed by Palma.

"He really came to play. I am very excited to see what he does this outdoor season," Donner said.

Cutting it even closer, Newberger qualified for the 200-meter final by 0.03 with an impressive 21.93. This effort pushed him to No. 2 all time for Bucknell. In the final, Newberger managed to break 22 seconds again to finish 10th.

Other men who competed included Noel Powell '03 in the long jump and the distance medley relay (DMR) of Matias Palavecino '03, Brain Klotz '03, John Trotta '06 and Wes Reinhardt '04. Powell struggled with foul trouble early, resulting in a shorter final jump from playing it safe to get a mark. The DMR ran a good race, as Palavecino and Trotta split seasonal bests, but the effort wasn't quite fast enough to qualify for the final.

On the women's side, Dennis earned All-East status once again with a personal best of 17:12 in the 5,000. Dennis went through the mile easily and then made an aggressive move from 10th to 4th. Leading the pack chasing the leaders for the rest of the race, she was able to hold on to her position.

"It was my first All-East indoors, so I was really excited," Dennis said after her race.

Dennis is hoping to build on the momentum for outdoors.

"I would like to break 36 minutes in the 10k, qualify for regionals in the 5, and I am looking for the school record to fall in the 5k as well. Of course a Patriot League Championship in either or both events would end my Bucknell running career nicely," Dennis said.

A number of Bison also had strong performances even though they did not make the finals. Amy Calvo '05 placed 14th in the 500, missing the finals by a mere 0.14 seconds. Jen Marsh '05 and Nicki Piper '03 placed 13th and 16th, respectively, in the 1000, with Marsh running a personal best. Charity Brady '03 finished 21st in 400 and then teamed up with Piper, Calvo and Monique Boley '05 to place 19th in the 4x400-meter relay.

The Bison are now looking towards a strong outdoor campaign, opening their season tomorrow at University of Maryland Baltimore County for the Raider Invitational.

"It's a very early outdoor meet in which we plan to train through it," Donner said. "Hopefully the weather still allows us to get some nice performances. It's also a great meet to see some of our athletes who compete in outdoor only events such as the 400 hurdles, javelin and hammer," Donner said.

Bison fall to top seeded Holy Cross in the semis of P.L. Tourney

By Joe Schweitzer
Staff Writer

The Bucknell women's basketball team defeated an upset-minded Navy squad 79-69 in overtime on March 7. Unfortunately, the squad was unable to pull off its own upset on March 9 and fell to top-seeded Holy Cross 66-63 in the semifinals of the Patriot Tournament. The Bison finished the season with a 13-15 record.

"I will never be the coach of a team that does not believe," Head Coach Kathy Fedorajka said after Sunday's loss.

"Believing" is the motto of this Bison squad, and it showed throughout the tournament as it continued to fight through adversity. Despite being the fourth seed in the tournament, the Orange and Blue were considered to be a very dangerous team.

A fearless Navy squad took it to the Bison in the first half and looked poised for the upset by scorching the nets with an amazing shooting performance. At one point, the Midshipmen were a blistering 78 percent from three-point land as they finished the first half with eight treys. The Orange and Blue offense was cold as ice and shot a dismal 30 percent in the first frame. The Bison created other scoring opportunities by connecting on 13 free throws to weather the Navy storm and head into the locker room down only four, 35-31.

Maile Shimoda opened the second half with two more of her amazing seven long balls to keep the heat on the Orange and Blue. Bucknell clawed back into the contest, but the team's poor shooting continued as even Patriot League MVP Molly Creamer '03 struggled to find her touch. Navy stretched its lead to double digits for much of the second half until finally Desire Almind '04 helped the Bison start to believe.

"I had no doubt we were going to win this game," Almind said. "We were not going to be denied."

The junior all-league performer was everywhere on the court during the final twelve minutes of the game. There was not a rebound that she didn't have her hand on and she continued to knock down tough inside shots virtually refusing to allow her team and her senior friends to settle for an early exit.

She kept the Bison in the contest just long enough until Creamer took over the game with just over four minutes remaining and the Bison down 14. Creamer lacked her silky shooting touch from the field, but created opportunities for herself from the foul line as she connected on seven free throws en route to scoring 18 of the Bison's final 22 points. None of the points were sweeter than the last three. With the Orange and Blue trailing by three points, and just seconds left, Kate Franks '03 misfired from downtown, but Almind and Creamer believed. Almind quickly grabbed the rebound and found a wide-open Creamer, who calmly drained a three pointer with three seconds left to tie the contest at 68. Creamer's shot sent Navy reeling as they were outscored 11 to 1 in the overtime period including seven more points from Molly to seal a 79-69 victory.

Navy shot an unbelievable 13 for 27 from beyond the arc to set a new Patriot League record and Shimoda set the individual record with her 7 for 10 performance en route to 26 points for the game to go with 10 assists.

Creamer was off the mark for much of the night, but fought her way to 36 points, eight rebounds and five assists. Almind dominated the paint setting a Patriot League Tournament record with 19 rebounds to go along with 23 points.

"I had no doubt we were going to win this game [against Navy]. We were not going to be denied."
—Desire Almind '04

The women pushed themselves to win all season long.

"Well I would rather be someone that works too hard than someone that doesn't work hard enough," Creamer said.

Two days later the team was back in semifinal action for a rematch of last year's Patriot League championship against rival Holy Cross. Bad blood boiled all season between these two league powers and both were out to prove their abilities.

The first half had all the action of a pay-per-view fight with the squads trading blow for blow as neither team led by more than six the entire contest. The Bison continued to believe as important role players stepped up at key moments and Creamer added the final six points of the half to pull Bucknell within two, 30-28.

The second half was packed with more thrills and plenty of unlikely heroes. Amy Ketcham '05 rattled off four straight points just when Holy Cross was looking to pull away. Lindsey Geosits '06 stepped up on the defensive end pressuring the Crusaders into turnovers. Co-captain Franks then stepped into the limelight connecting on a couple of three pointers to pull the Orange and Blue within one, 56-55. Down the stretch it was again Creamer's time to shine as she dribbled down the court with her team down by one with just 30 seconds left in her career. Creamer slashed to the basket easily and was clobbered by a Holy Cross defender as she attempted a shot, but no whistle was blown. The Crusaders extended their lead to three on a running hook shot in the lane, but the Bison would have a chance for the tie with six seconds left. It was the same situation as Navy, only this time Creamer missed the first three pointer and again it was Almind with the rebound and pass to an open Franks. The ball didn't bounce Bucknell's way, and the Bison suffered a 66-63 defeat rather than heading to overtime.

The game marked the end of two of the most successful women's basketball careers in school history, as Franks and Creamer will graduate in May. Franks took one last record with her by setting a single-season record for three pointers made in a season 66, and scored 16 points in her last contest. Creamer finished one of the greatest careers in school, league and national basketball history by tallying 15 points and earning a first-team all tournament selection.

The one bright spot of the game was the way some of the young players stepped up and believed in themselves to show that the Orange and Blue will have a bright future. Amy Ketcham '05 had a monster tournament in the low post and just missed a double double in the semifinal with 10 rebounds and nine points. Geosits played suffocating pressure defense to go with four points and nine rebounds. Almind was also selected to the all-tournament team after posting her seventh double double in the last 10 games with 17 points and 10 rebounds.

"I will never be the coach of a team that does not believe."
—Head Coach Kathy Fedorajka after Sunday's loss to Holy Cross

The 2002-2003 Bucknell women's basketball team swallowed one of its most bitter defeats Feb. 28 as it fell 91-79 to Holy Cross. The Orange and Blue could not wait to get their hands on Holy Cross in the friendly confines of Sojka Pavilion as these teams have waged a heated rivalry ever since the Bison's memorable victory in last season's Patriot League Championship game. Holy Cross was again the top-ranked team in the league and had been since the preseason, while no one has given Bucknell an ounce of respect since their championship run, including the Crusaders' players and coaches.

That motivation was not enough as Holy Cross had an answer for every run the Bison forged throughout the night. The Orange and Blue executed perfectly in the first half and played solid half court defense, but Holy Cross turned to a fast break attack in the second half and created many easy opportunities to help them put Bucknell away.

Creamer continued her remarkable season with a game-high 28 points. Geosits

A flag worth facing

This Monday I had the pleasure of chuckling my way through the 685 words that constitute Toni Smith's written response to the indignation her antics have bred in hundreds of Americans. This morass of triteness was committed to media courtesy of The Sporting News, a publication that has been in circulation since 1886, covering athletics in this country all the way across a timeline that has transversed a handful of wars, conflicts and national crises.

As America stares down its next battle, the pages of our oldest sports news source gave the pen to Smith, a sociology major at Manhattanville College whose favorite quote, according to her profile on the college's athletics Web site, is "It will be a great day when our schools get all the money they need and the military has to hold a bake sale to buy a bomber."

Smith, who has received far more attention for her insipid protest of the war on Iraq than she ever could have gained through athletic prowess, chose to regale us with an explanation of her actions.

In all fairness, she has a right to explain herself. Luckily for her, this is America, a place where freedoms like that are considered worth dying for, even though clearly that isn't something her self-proclaimed "deep thinking" mind can wrap its cerebral cortex around.

Fortunately, everyone who reads the statement has the right to wade through her college-cultivated proclamations of inequalities—platitude by platitude—and gut her idealized version of "justice" with the flashing incisors of reality, maturity and duty.

I'm willing to admit that I am not yet equipped with those weapons of intellect. Unlike Smith, I have the humility to recognize the fact that sports-writers who outgun me in age by 20 years probably have the upper hand when it comes to understanding the workings of justice and the meaning of life in this country. Nonetheless, I can't resist throwing myself into the fray, armed with what I have learned in my 21 years.

What I do know is that Smith's diatribe hit an unpleasant chord (in an already unpleasant symphony) with me when she said, "The American flag … is a political symbol that represents power and conquest. It has no relation to sports."

Sorry, "Lady T," but you're dead wrong. You couldn't be more wrong. I'm not one to tell people their opinions are wrong, but I'd have to say that with that statement, your words stumbled out of the realm of opinion and into the domain of pure fallacy.

That flag on your gymnasium's wall—along with every American flag across the world, from the tattered one that flew over the ruins of the Twin Towers to the tiny silk flag that sits above me as I type this column—is not simply the symbol of some war, some "conquest," some greedy looting of the meek that you have concocted in your narrow mind. It is a symbol of more things than you seem capable of imagining.

Among those things are the qualities that constitute everything sports have meant to this country for the past 200 years and everything that sports ought to be.

Unity, for one. Our country's flag is a symbol of unity, a foundation of this nation and a foundation of American sports. Unity is bigger than diversity. Bigger than pettiness. Bigger than self-serving ideals and egocentric itineraries.

When you put on a uniform and line up with your teammates, you become part of a unit that drives toward a simple goal—to defend what you have collectively fought so hard to obtain in the first place.

Athletes work together to earn and maintain for their team all that makes sports worthwhile, the things that have also defined our country and are implicit in the red, white and blue rectangle of fabric that you spurn—pride, courage, work ethic and ultimately, the American Dream.

This country was founded by a bunch of misfits, with nothing much to build on but hope and pertinacity. We were the 1962 New York Mets of the 18th century world.

But the Mets and America, we both turned out OK. That's how it works with the American Dream. You can build mansions from matchsticks—it doesn't always go that way, of course, but it's possible in our nation.

This country's flag waves for pride, too. Not conceit, not self-worship or really even confidence, but a different kind of pride—the pride born in knowing that you did everything possible to aid your cohorts toward the common goal. Pride is in part a construct of winning, but it has more to do with courage and work ethic. Without work ethic, there is no pride. Without courage, there is no pride.

Some sportswriters, whom I struggle to believe are actually adults, have called you courageous, and its easy to tell that you, too, think its an appropriate label for your little flirt with martyrdom.

I'm supremely confident, though, that what you have done has little to do with courage.

Courage is waiting in the scorching desert sun, not knowing what the next week, the next day, the next hour will bring, not knowing when, if ever, you'll see your homeland and your loved ones again. Courage is standing up to hijackers, orchestrating your own fiery demise in a Pennsylvania field so that hundreds of would-be victims can walk home alive and hug their kids that evening without ever knowing their lives were in peril. Courage is taking a slug from an AK in the gut to protect some snide little college student's right to turn her back on everything you've fought for.

On a much smaller and far less critical stage, sports operate on similar principles, more so than any other form of entertainment.

It would, of course, be naïve to think that there isn't corruption in this nation. It's true that our flag—just like every other flag—has flown over scandal, swindle, shame and bloody soil. That's nothing new.

It's familiar ground to the world of sports, too. Diabolic motives, greed, cheating, bribing, discrimination, miscalculation, disparity—you name it, it's been a part of the sports world's seedy underbelly at some point in history.

But in the face of all the horror and injustice, amid the monotony of life's struggles, our flag reminds us to fight the good fight. It reminds us that there's something to persist for in the first place.

And that notion is, and always will be, entrenched in the great American sport. Athletes and real sports fans just understand that. Ask Ted Williams. Ask Pat Tillman. Ask Rick Monday. Ask the 1980 U.S. Olympic hockey team.

It isn't blind patriotism. It's not that we've failed to seek insight into what we're saluting. It's just that we see something you flag-scorners can't see.

Our flag—and all the beauty that it represents—has everything to do with sports. Everything.

That is why we line up, facing our nation's symbol, with all its political implications and all its history, good, bad and otherwise. That is why Old Glory flies over ballparks, stadiums, gymnasiums, racetracks and playing fields all over our nation. That's why we line up, with our hands over our hearts, shoulder to shoulder with our teammates, our comrades, and face the flag.

So go ahead and turn away. You have every right to do so. Turn away from all of it.

The athletes who really get sports, the people you think are naïve, from multimillion dollar, hot-shot, world-class athletes like Mike Piazza and Al Leiter to broken-down walk-ons like myself, will still stand aside our teammates and face that flag.

We—the blind patriots, the political sheep, the hypocrites—we'll do just fine without you.

Wartime decisions

The country is gearing up for the impending war in Iraq (as of Wednesday afternoon). As around the time of 9/11, sports has played a healing element and normalizing factor, demonstrating the determination of the American spirit to not have lives altered by threats or fears from foreign actors. March Madness and the Opening Day of baseball are next in line for sportsfans. Should we play the games? What are the risks? These are questions high level officials have wrestled with for months, ultimately deciding on distinct and prudent measures.

Opening Day of baseball was less than one week away and was expected to kick off with a showcase in Japan featuring the Seattle Mariners and Oakland Athletics on March 25. Schedules are set in stone right? Not so says baseball commissioner Bud Selig. Baseball has decided to keep its players local, rescheduling the games for April 3 and June 30 in Oakland.

According to ESPN.com Selig stated that "given the uncertainty that now exists throughout the world, we believe the safest course of action for the players involved and the many staff personnel who must work the games is to reschedule the opening series. It would be unfair and terribly unsettling for them to be half a world away—away from their families at this critical juncture."

Players have not been shy voicing their desire to stay near their families in this time of need.

ESPN.com reported earlier in the week that before the decision Oakland third baseman Eric Chavez said, "We've got guys going to war for our country. I want to be here. Call me patriotic or whatever, this is where I want to be."

"I don't like the idea of being out of the country when the country is going to war," Seattle first baseman John Olerud said.

Besides this recall of American-based teams, there are no other plans to delay any games that have been scheduled in the United States. The feeling is to keep the American public on as normal a schedule as possible considering the position we are in. Basketball at the collegiate level has also echoed those sentiments.

After a lengthy deliberation, the NCAA has concluded that they will not postpone or move any men's and women's basketball tournament games or other events if the United States goes to war with Iraq.

"We are also concerned that life goes on as normal," NCAA president Myles Brand said. "We see no reason, after consulting with Homeland Defense Secretary Tom Ridge, to make any alterations to our plan."

CBS, the broadcast station that has exclusive rights to televise the tournament, has reached an agreement to move NCAA Tournament games to ESPN and ESPN2 if war breaks out in Iraq; which would free up CBS for 24/7 broadcasting of the situation.

In order for the games to go on, strict security measures have been introduced prohibiting items including large bags, backpacks and large purses; firearms, explosives and other weapons; cans and coolers; artificial noise-makers; large signs, flags, sticks, poles, banners and laser pointers; video cameras on game days; and food or beverages.

Playing the games will take our minds off possible Iraqi use of chemical and biological warfare on our troops, instead allowing our minds to drift to the pleasures our nation has to offer. America is at a time when the "United" in "United States of America" needs to shine forth, both in the political arena and in sports, where unsung heroes entertain and keep time ticking forward.

Baseball keeps rolling on

Tail firmly planted between its chafing thighs, major-league-baseball has decided to forego the playing of its opening day series in Japan due to America's war with the world. I'm glad to hear at least someone in this country can get an airline ticket refund.

Although the union president and the commish himself are saying that this is the "prudent" course of action, I can't help but feel how weak this makes our nation look. On the one hand, we have unilaterally spear-headed a war with a dictator, destroyed ties with our closest allies and stripped the United Nations of all credibility and power on a foundation of hubris, yet at the same time we're scared to hop an overnight flight to Tokyo to get some good Kung Pao pork.

Yes, sporting events are great terrorist threat sites, but don't you think they could find better teams to threaten than the Seattle Mariners and the Oakland Athletics? We've seen that Osama has read up on his de Sausser and Derrida. He knows his signs and signifiers. The World Trade Center as a signifier of financial security and the Pentagon as a signifier of military security were appropriate targets. But if Osama were really serious, he'd pick a much more "symbolic" team than Seattle or Oakland—the Yankees for instance.

Ahh, let's all think what that might look like: a world without Yankees. I see roads paved with gumdrops and candy cane lampposts; cars run on chocolate and ballpark hot dogs cost a nickel; Roger Clemens (the only one to survive the blast, shielded by an over-inflated ego and a canopy of broken bat shards that hovers over his head like a cartoon rain cloud) runs a tobogganing store in Pensacola where he sits in a corner so local kids can poke at him with shrimp skewers.

But in all seriousness, in honor of major-league-baseball's war effort, I have composed a new version of the official song of the U.S. Army, originally set to "As those caissons going rolling along" and heretofore entrust it to your memory.

Official song of major-league-baseball
Written and adapted by Aaron DeRosa

Coast along, sing our song,
We're the Army of the scared.
Notice the urine streaming forth
Collecting in pools at Safeco park
We're baseball and proud of our shame
We're baseball and proudly proclaim

First to flee for the States,
And to drive up ticket rates,
As our prices go rolling along
Proud of all we have done
Just to sell the Yanks the sun
As free-trade goes rolling along.

Refrain:
Then it's Hi! Hi! Hey!
The union's on its way to make sure the All-star game is dull
For where e'er we go,
Fans will always know
Baseball's interests go rolling along.

A-Rod still scoring runs while depleting Texas funds
As baseball goes rolling along
Lou Piniella, not so smart,
Always clutching at his heart,
But baseball keeps rolling along.

Refrain:
Then it's Hi! Hi! Hee!
No more drugs for me.
Ephedra tests will always be a joke
Because you'll never know
though my stats will surely grow because the union goes rolling along

Refrain:
Then it's Hi! Hi! Hey!
Baseball's on its way.
To show that our country ain't afraid,
For where e'er we go,
The world will always know
That baseball will hide in its cave.

For the Mets, it's all about the chemistry

By Mark Walker
Staff Writer

The odds of the New York Mets winning the World Series significantly improved last Wednesday following a Spring Training matchup against the Los Angeles Dodgers.

With the Mets trailing 10-1 in the bottom of the 6th, Mike Piazza stepped up to the plate to face Guillermo Mota, who had plunked Piazza with a pitch last spring, creating some bad blood between the two. Mota's first pitch brushed Piazza way off the plate. On the ensuing pitch, Mota threw a fastball towards Piazza's head, hitting him in the upper back.

Piazza had clearly had enough of getting thrown at, especially in a meaningless Grapefruit League rout, and instantly took off towards the mound. Mota, in self-defense, threw his mitt at Piazza and then backpedaled like a coward. Three Dodgers struggled to hold back Piazza, who had an angry and possessed look in his eyes. With Piazza restrained, the rest of the Mets came to his defense and charged after Mota who gutlessly retreated into the Dodger dugout behind the protection of his teammates.

Following the game, Piazza remained more furious than when someone calls long distance without using 10-10-220. After being ejected, Piazza went to the Dodger clubhouse looking to confront Mota. Dodger outfielder Brian Jordan had already escorted Mota out of the stadium, preventing further confrontation.

As a result of the bench-clearing incident, Mike Piazza and some other Mets will likely receive suspensions and miss the start of the season. Also, this gives the Mets another unneeded distraction that the New York media will play up all season, much like they did with the Roger Clemens situation over the past few seasons. Considering this, how could I say that this event will actually help the Mets in the long run?

This fracas will go a long way toward creating the chemistry in the Mets' locker room that was completely lacking all of last year.

The 2002 New York Mets were quite possibly the most underachieving team in sports history. General manager Steve Phillips and the Mets ownership had cleaned out their wallets to bring in big name players, such as Roberto Alomar, Jeromy Burnitz, Mo Vaughn and Roger Cedeno. The team came in last place, because a lack of unity caused the talent to underachieve.

All of last season, conflicts and distractions arose within the clubhouse, which caused the Mets to lose focus of the game. Several players were accused of smoking pot, Shawn Estes failed to come to Mike Piazza's defense, as he "missed" Roger Clemens with a fastball, Roberto Alomar and Rey Ordonez had some choice words for one another, and Mike Piazza's focus was taken away from the clubhouse to clear up rumors regarding his sexuality.

Last week's incident between Piazza and Mota will undoubtedly bring back a lot of the chemistry that could not be found in the Mets organization last year. Piazza did not charge the mound alone. The second he left the batters box, the rest of the Mets sprinted on to the field to support Piazza. They did not pull a Derek Jeter and just come out of the dugout and stand around, pretending they were supporting Piazza. Instead, the Mets players shared Piazza's fury and frantically chased Mota all the way into the dugout. Jeromy Burnitz, finally doing something productive in a Met uniform, led the charge at Mota. Following Burnitz were all 170 pounds of Joe McEwing, who, despite his small size, was willing to come to the defense of his teammate.

Piazza had to feel great that his teammates enthusiastically came to his defense. The Mets made it clear that an attack on one Met was an attack on the whole team. Moreover, Mota's foolishness was the spark that the Mets needed to unite them as a team.

Last year, the Mets had arguably the most raw talent in the league, but struggled because they were not a team, but rather a group of individuals wearing the same color jersey. This year, the Mets added even more talent by bringing in Tom Glavine, Mike Stanton, Cliff Floyd and Manager Art Howe. The only thing that can keep the 2003 Mets from a successful season is if the team does not gel together as one. Without question, last Wednesday's incident brought the Mets together as one and created a lot more chemistry in the locker room. With a talented team now united as one, nothing should prevent the Mets from bringing the first World Series championship to Queens in 17 years.

"We didn't have the best game against North Carolina the game before, but we knew that we had the confidence and that it was just about putting the pieces of the puzzle together," Sussman said. "Coach put together a good game plan, and we did what we had to do."

Copelan and Andrew Sanders '03 had two goals apiece for the Bison and five other players got on the board, which made it very difficult for Harvard to focus on any one player.

"When a lot of different people are scoring, it's a very good thing," Jamieson said. "That's what we had against Harvard."

The following weekend proved to be just as successful as the Bison beat Butler 10-2. This time Sussman was greatly helped by his defense that only aliowed 21 shots on goal the whole game.

Chris Cara '05 scored two goals and added five assists to spark the offense. Wes Fetchet '03, Geraghty and John Terracciano '03 tallied two goals each.

"We played a total game from beginning to end," Jamieson said. "We were in control from the very start, and we never gave them any breathing room."

After playing away the first four games of this season, the Bison are now home for five games, which includes the important Patriot League contests beginning with a match against Holy Cross tomorrow.The team will be looking to the University for support as crunch time is fast approaching for the Bison who are hoping for a Patriot League title and an automatic bid to the NCAA tournament.

"I've never been so excited to play in my life," Sussman said. "Now we get to show the school what we're about. We've been waiting to be able to play in front of our fans for a month."

Women's softball team gains its first victory

The softball team beat the University of Maine 6-1 in Orlando, Fla., on March 15 to register the first victory of its 2003 campaign.

The Bison (1-11) held Maine scoreless until the sixth inning, while scoring three runs in the third inning and one run each in the next three innings. With one out in the third, Jill Pompeii '05 and Angela Stackhouse '04 got on base on an error and a bobbled ball, respectively. Lauren Wible '06 followed with a RBI double into deep center, scoring Pompeii. Stackhouse scored on a Meredith Gill '03 walk. Jennifer Ross '05 connected with a RBI single to score Wible. The Orange and Blue tacked on another run in the fourth, when Pompeii doubled, Stackhouse singled to send Pompeii to third and Wible sacrificed bunted to bring her in. Alyssa Schneebaum '06 smashed a triple down the left field line in the fifth inning to score Ross, who had reached first base on an error.

Kelly Haskins '05 pitches during a 2002 game. The team defeated University of Maine to record its first win.

After Maine scored a run in the sixth, the Bison came back and promptly scored another run. Stackhouse was walked, then Wible hit a double to send her to third and Ross hit a single to bring Stackhouse in. Julie Williams '06 pitched a complete game while picking up her first collegiate victory.

In the second game of the day, the Bison dropped a 6-0 decision to Quinnipiac. They held Quinnipiac to one run until the fifth inning when Quinnipiac struck for three runs and tacked on two more in the sixth. The team connected for five scattered hits, while giving up 11.

The 2003 season got off to a rocky start. The team was excited to be traveling to Orlando to participate in the Rebel Spring Games, but was not excited to drop its first 10 games. On the first day of action, March 9, the Orange and Blue lost to Butler 9-1 and to Pennsylvania 11-3.

Bucknell went up 1-0 over Butler in the first inning when Wible hit in Kristen Potts '04. Butler came back to score one run each in the second and third innings, and then opened up the game with four runs in the fourth. The Bison gave up 12 hits, while collecting only four.

Pennsylvania jumped out to a 3-0 lead in the first and tacked on three more runs in the second. The Bison attempted to stage a comeback when Stackhouse knocked in two RBIs on a double in the third inning.

The rally did not last, as Pennsylvania scored five more runs in the third and fourth innings.

They dropped their two games the next day 9-1 and 7-2 to George Mason and Fairfield, respectively. George Mason was held scoreless until the third inning, when they gave up a run. George Mason struck for two more in the fifth and three each in the sixth and seventh innings.

The lone Bison run came in the sixth inning.

Fairfield scored one run in the first inning, and then broke the game open with five runs off of four hits in the second. The Bison scored one run each in the sixth and seventh innings. Gill scored on an error by Fairfield's right fielder in the sixth. She doubled in the seventh and scored again on an error by the shortstop. The Orange and Blue connected for a season-high seven hits off of Fairfield.

They were hit just as hard by Rhode Island on March 12, when Rhode Island jumped out to a 4-0 lead in the first and never gave the Bison an opportunity to get back into the game en route to an 8-0 final tally.

In the second game of the day, Youngstown picked up two quick runs in the first inning, but then the Bison defense buckled down and allowed only two more runs throughout the rest of the game.

The defensive spark did not initiate an offensive rally, as it took until the fifth inning to record a hit. Jenna Fitch '04 connected for a single. Lauren Box '03 then reached base on a fielder's choice. Pompeii knocked in two runs on a double.

The Bison took March 13 off from the Rebel games to play the University of Central Florida and Binghamton on Central Florida's fields.

In the first game of the day, Binghamton opened up the game with five runs in the second inning. The game concluded after the fifth inning with a final score of 10-0. The Bison dropped an 11-0 decision to Central Florida later in the day.

> "We're going to come out every weekend and play hard,"
> —Janelle Breneman, head coach

The Orange and Blue came closer to a victory on March 14, but came up just short as they lost 5-3 to both Tennessee Martin and St. Joseph's. They went up 3-0 in the second inning of the contest against Tennessee Martin. Wible was walked and Gill came in as a pinch runner. The pitcher tried to pick Gill off, but instead committed a throwing error that allowed her to advance to second. Fitch grounded to third, but another error was committed that advanced all runners to the next base. Schneebaum connected for a RBI single. Another Tennessee error scored two more runs.

The lead was not to last, as the Bison gave up a run in the fourth inning and two each in the sixth and seventh innings. Williams pitched a complete game, walking two and striking out two. They were down 4-0 after three innings against St. Joseph's. The offense rallied for three runs in the fifth, but the comeback attempt fell short.

Now back in Lewisburg, the Bison look to add more wins to their record. They were voted by the Patriot League coaches to finish fifth in the league, but Head Coach Janelle Breneman does not look at the prediction negatively. Rather, she believes that anything can happen, especially as a team loaded with first-year students gains more experience.

"We're going to come out every weekend and play hard," Breneman said.

The Orange and Blue returned only three seniors and three juniors this year, and one of the seniors is out because of an injury. Four first-year team members are regular starters, and according to Breneman, have been playing very well. Wible has been hitting consistently and Williams found a spot in the starting pitching rotation.

The Bison return to action taking on Siena in a four-game series at 2 p.m. tomorrow and noon Sunday at the Bucknell West Fields.

Water polo reaches .750 mark in league

By Pat Evans

The women's water polo team finished up its West Coast trip last weekend, going 1-3 at the Lancer Invitational held by Cal Baptist. The team is now 5-8 on the season and more importantly, 3-1 in league contests.

The Bison concluded the weekend with a heartbreaking loss to 20th-ranked Cal State Northridge 4-3. The Orange and Blue were down 3-1 at halftime, but battled back to tie the score midway through the fourth quarter. Despite a tremendous defensive effort the team could not hold on to get the win.

"Both teams played excellent defense," Head Coach John Zeigler said. "We missed some early opportunities to score, which would've made the difference in the game."

Goalie Lindsay Chesterfield '03 tallied a season-high 14 saves to help thwart the strong Northridge offensive attack.

"It could have gone either way," Chesterfield said. "We both put up a fight and we hung in there and did everything we could, it just didn't go our way."

Earlier in the weekend Meg Blitzer '05 scored three goals and tallied two assists to lead the Bison over Chapman 8-4. Also scoring multiple goals was Kelly Hofstetter '04 with two.

"We were a much stronger team than Chapman," Zeigler said. "Also, we're pretty deep, which kept them scrambling and wore them out."

Pomona-Pitzer and Bakersfield got the best of the Bison earlier in the tournament winning 9-7 and 9-5, respectively.

"Overall I was disappointed that we didn't win all our games on the West Coast like I thought we could've if we had played up to our potential," Zeigler said. "But I think we got a lot out of the experience."

The most important thing for the Bison is that they are ready for the league contests. The team is currently 3-1 in the Patriot League, knocking off Villanova, George Washington and Salem International earlier in the season and losing only to 17th-ranked Princeton. The team is happy with its 3-1 league record and knows that the meaning of the Lancer Invitational goes beyond the wins and losses.

"It was a good building and learning experience," Chesterfield said. "It was also a great chance for us to bond as a team, and I think we did that."

victory.

"It seemed like they had an emphasis on getting him the ball down low from the start," Lalugba said. "That set the tone for the rest of the game. He only scored two points in the second half but the damage had been done by then."

Bucknell shot just 33 percent in the first half and trailed at the break by the score of 35-25. The Bison battled hard in the second half and Roland Webber's '04 three-point shot with 11 minutes, 36 seconds left to play in the game pulled the Orange and Blue to within 42-39, while capping off a 12-3 run.

Webber reflected on his ability to help the team keep the game within reach when the offense was struggling.

"I have been playing with a lot more confidence lately," Webber said. "I caught the ball in rhythm and just let it fly. It is too bad that we were unable to capitalize. There is no doubt that it was a big shot and it got us going, but Colgate hit equally big shots for the duration of the game, not just in certain situations. I just tried to provide a spark."

Bucknell actually pulled to within one point with a little over seven minutes remaining on a Tarik Viaer-McClymont '06 layup, but the Bison were only able to muster one field goal in the next five minutes.

Alvin Reed then hit a jumper to push the Raiders' lead back to three, and Dave Hardy's jumper with 2:50 remaining gave Colgate a double-digit lead again. Colgate never looked back from there. Chris Niesz '05 talked about the Hardy dagger and how it put a damper on the late Bison run, but didn't quite seal the deal at that particular point in the game.

"I didn't feel like we let one slip away at that point," Niesz said. "Because we played so poorly we really didn't deserve to win the game, but we weren't out of the game at that point."

Lalugba recorded his 16th double-double of the season, as he finished the game with 16 points and 10 rebounds. Kevin Bettencourt '06 added 11 points.

The Bison had defeated Colgate five straight times and had won nine of the last 10 contests. It was Colgate's first win in Lewisburg since 1997-98.

Niesz feels that despite the fact that there was speculation that the Raiders were due for a win, the Bison loss had nothing to do with chance.

"I did not feel that Colgate was due for a win against us here at home, despite our dominance over them as of late," Niesz said. "I just feel that we played badly."

and Ketcham both stepped up their games registering career highs with 11 and 8 points, respectively, for the Orange and Blue.

The squad fought off the adversity of the Holy Cross setback and rode the emotion of Senior Night to treat Bison fans to one last thrilling home victory as they defeated Colgate 82-75 on March 2. The Bison season was marred with highs and lows, but the team completed its regular season on a high and gave seniors one last home win.

"I love our seniors," Almind said. "This night and this game was about them. I was not going to let us lose this game."
